JNF trip heads to Israel

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — Thirty-six people from the Hamilton area and 14 from London and Windsor will participate in the Feb. 16-28 JNF Mega Tour to Israel, reports Hamilton-based regional JNF shaliach, Yoram Gordon.

Fifty participants from south-western Ontario out of a total of just over 300 from across Canada, "is very nice," Gordon observes, adding that it's "20 per cent more than last year."

Going with the group will be Rabbi Bernard and Marjory Baskin, who will lead the south-west Ontario contingent, and Dundas mayor, John Addison.

For Addison, says Gordon, the trip will be an opportunity to strengthen ties with the city of Afula, with which Dundas has been twinned since 1989.

Besides meeting with the mayor of Afula and the Afula Youth Orchestra, which visited Dundas in 1990, arrangements have been made for Addison to visit Nazareth and other Christian holy sites.

A tour of Christian holy sites has also been arranged for other non-Jewish tour members.

For those going on this tour for the second time, there's a separate program that will include a visit to Arab and Druze villages and a night at the Mitzpeh Ramon conservation area.

A highlight for the Hamilton group will be the celebration on Masada of the bat mitzvah of "Missy," (Morissa), granddaughter of Al and Pearl Cohen and daughter of their son, Larry. The Cohens lead a family group of seven that includes Missy's older brothers, Joshua and Jonathan, and uncle, Michael Cohen. Rabbi Baskin, Rabbi Emeritus of Temple Anshe Sholom, the Cohens' long-time congregation, will lead the service.

The tour will be in Israel over Purim, "which should be very nice," says Gordon.

ISRAEL FESTIVAL

York University's Bear Pit was the scene of last week's three-day Israel Festival, to which Israeli singer Kobi Chaim (background) was a lively addition.

The festival, organized by students Gena Rotstein and Tomer Berliner of the Jewish Student Federation, featured a slide show on Israel, generous samples of Israeli delicacies, and a large sign-in board in support of peace. Tagar, the newly organized Herut-Likud affiliate for university students, had a display table. Jewish books and artifacts from Negev Book & Gift Store were offered for sale.

Common Ground is gearing down

TORONTO — Common Ground, the non-profit, privately funded organization which has utilized role-playing seminars to teach 4,000 Torontonians about Israel and the Middle East, is gearing down. A decrease in funding as well as a noticeable drop in attendance at its seminars followed the Sept. 13 signing of the peace accord between Israel and the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO), Common Ground director and co-founder Sender Axelbaum told The CJN.

"Israel is no longer under fire," said Axelbaum. "As long as Israel was perceived in a negative light, we had to have educational programming. People felt compelled to respond. Interest has dropped off radically [since September]. At this point the program cannot continue to be sustained [as it was]."

Common Ground is closing its office at the Jewish Community Centre North Y branch and will cease fundraising. Its programs will continue to be offered on a limited basis to larger groups by Michael Berger, who served as the organization's educational director. Axelbaum is returning to his hometown, St. Louis, with a long-term goal of making aliyah.

Common Ground was the outgrowth of an idea that began at Aish HaTorah in Israel, which provided the seed money for the program and instituted its own seminars in Jerusalem. Axelbaum and Berger brought the idea to Toronto in 1991.

Each of their seminars, most of which were held at private homes, consisted of lively role-playing scenarios in which participants defended beliefs ranging from Likud to Labor to Islamic Fundamentalist. Participants were provided with comprehensive but easily understood background information to enable them to speak with authority. Axelbaum and Berger culled their briefing information from over two dozen Israeli experts, both Arab and Jewish, with whom they remained in close contact.

Last year they began an offshoot program, in which 50 "ambassadors" pledged to discuss Israel's concerns with 50 people over the course of a year.

Those wishing to arrange Common Ground seminars can reach Berger at 416-785-9414. — F.K.

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In the few months since Sharon Tsur's arrival in Toronto, the young shlicha brought from Israel by Herut-Likud has begun to revitalize the right-wing organization. As Betar-Tagar shlicha, her mission is to strengthen the group's youth wing (Betar) and organize for the first time a Toronto chapter of Tagar, the branch of Herut-Likud begun 10 years ago for university students.

Tsur, 21, is to the best of her knowledge the youngest shlicha ever sent by the World Zionist Organization to a Diaspora community. The first emissary to serve Herut-Likud in Toronto, she is following in the footsteps of her maternal grandmother, Rina Rosenblatt, who was a Betar shlicha in 1930s Poland.

Tsur's late grandfather, Zvi Rosenblatt, was one of the three Zionist Revisionists accused but eventually acquitted of the murder of early Zionist labor movement leader Chaim Arlosoroff in Palestine 60 years ago. The Zionist Revisionist movement, of which Betar was an offshoot, was founded by Vladimir Jabotinsky.

Largely because of her grandfather's experience, Tsur was steeped in Herut ideology from the time she was very young. In 1981, Tsur's mother was leading tours to the territories beyond Israel's Green Line (pre-1967 borders) to encourage people to settle there.

Sharon Tsur

At the time Tsur was a politically aware 9-year-old. She recalls answering a knock at the door to find a plumber summoned by her mother. Even though the house was "full of water," the future shlicha insisted on knowing how he was going to vote before she would agree to let him in.

When the plumber stated his intention to vote Labor, "I wouldn't let him in," Tsur recalls, laughing. "Today I'm not like that," she says, although she believes that "people should take a stand."

Her own stand as a shlicha is that Tagar "is not discrediting but not supporting the [current Israeli] government."

Tagar's role is twofold, she says: education and activism. With the help of a small, newly formed committee, Tsur has launched two major campaigns, one to work on freeing missing Israeli navigator Ron Arad, and the second to support Israelis living in the Golan Heights.

Because Tsur is the same age as many university students, she asked herself in Israel, "What would I want to do?" She felt strongly about the above-mentioned campaigns, and filled a suitcase with related literature and pre-printed postcards to bring to Toronto.

The skills Tsur brings to her role as shlicha can be traced in part to her experience in the Israeli air force, where she served as a social worker/counsellor after completing an intensive four-month training course.

Born in Toronto, Tsur moved to Israel at the age of 8. She wants to make it clear that although she "doesn't like" the way the peace process is shaping up, she'll "be the first one to be happy if it works out."

Tsur says that she is for peace, but that she doesn't know what the solution is. "I do believe that the Golan Heights is an inseparable part of Israel," she said.

Tsur is now promoting Tagar's upcoming conference in Pennsylvania at the end of February, to include workshops on challenging campus anti-Semitism.

CIP seder program aids Russian families

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It is said that the table becomes sweeter when you invite a stranger to your Passover seder. Toronto Jewish families are once again being asked to sweeten their seder tables by hosting recently arrived Russian Jews.

The seder program, now in its fifth year, matches Russian families with Canadian hosts on the basis of age (including ages of children) and interests.

"It would be easy to stress the benefit for the Russian families, but it's definitely a two-way pleasure," says Susan Goldberg, co-chair with Marsha Slavens of the Community Integration Program (CIP) under whose auspices the seder program operates. The CIP is a joint program of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto and the Jewish Community Centre (JCC), operating out of the JCC's North Y branch on Bathurst Street.

In addition to the seder program, CIP runs a number of programs for newly arrived immigrants, including classes in English as a Second Language (ESL) and a program called Family-to-Family in which Canadian and Russian Jewish families are matched for a one-year period to share holidays, friendship and cultural awareness.

One seder program host wrote on a follow-up evaluation form that their guests' stories of life in Russia "made our seder more meaningful."

Many of the guests have never had the opportunity to celebrate Jewish holidays, nor are they likely to have had much contact with Canadian Jewish families, said Luda Felik, CIP staff associate who immigrated to Canada five years ago after a decade in Israel. She is originally from Moldova.

Before she immigrated to Canada, Felik was told, "It's a cold country and the people are cold."

"In my experience," she says, "the people are very warm. They try to help you."

When interviewed at the JCC, Felik played the tape of an interview she had had with a Russian Jew whose family had participated in the seder program.

"Now we know we are Jews," he said. "In Russia my family and my children knew we were Jews [but to be Jewish there] is very bad. Now after this program I'm proud to be Jewish. We celebrate Pesach like Canadian Jews now."

Host families are given a trilingual Haggadah printed in English, Hebrew and Russian. CIP also distributes an explanatory booklet for those who know little about Passover.

"I think it's like rekindling a light," said Goldberg. "A lot of [guests] talk of the Canadian family being a role model. It's a very successful, feel-good kind of program on both sides."

"It's a very big mitzvah," says JCC North Y branch program director Rosanne Zarnett, who is overseeing the seder program for the first time this year. The program can be viewed as a tool in strengthening Jewish continuity by "bridging the gap" between Russian Jews and the established Jewish community, Zarnett stressed.

Over 1,200 Russian Jews arrived in Toronto this year, said Goldberg. Last year close to 140 Canadian families hosted Russian families through CIP. To obtain more information about becoming part of the seder program, please call the Seder Hotline at 631-5680.

Winnipeg lawyer Rocky Pollack is chairing the conference. Freda Steel, a professor of law at the University of Manitoba, is the program chair.

Pollack said the conference is geared towards teachers, lay persons, parents and students.

Full registration includes GST, conference material, two receptions, two lunches and one dinner for $178 before Feb. 15 and $199 after that date. The same package is available to students for $100. A basic registration without meals costs $75 before Feb. 15 and $95 after that date. Registration packages are available through CJC regional offices and CZF bureaus across the country.

Topics to be addressed include the role of Jewish education in continuity, marketing Jewish education, the Jewish response to social issues, teaching a second language, the Israel experience and Zionist education, and Jewish women. The 75th anniversary of CJC and Yom Ha'atzmaut will also be celebrated.

Participants will be offered optional visits of local schools on both Friday, April 15 and Tuesday, April 19. For more information contact Shellie Ettinger in Montreal (514) 931-7531 or Lawrence Lavitt in Winnipeg (204) 949-1482.

Air Canada has been appointed the official airline for the convention. Call Frances Maron at Travel Eze, 1-800-387-9966 (in Montreal, 322-2814) or Air Canada, 1-800-361-7585. When purchasing a ticket, please ask that your Event Number CV940132 be entered in the Tour Code box and Reference Code CJC-5 in the Endorsement box, regardless of the fare purchased.

Israeli artists colony influenced Hamady

By AMY SATTIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Owner Cherna Hamady says she knew the Roseborough Gallery was going to be a success from the "good vibes" she sensed emanating from the building.

Perhaps that's because the Yonge Street location was the former election headquarters of the Natural Law Party.

When Hamady took over the lease soon after the Oct. 25 federal election, she found a legacy from the previous tenants.

"There were rainbows everywhere," she laughs, gesturing at walls now covered with prints. "We had to paint over a huge one in the middle of that wall."

The Roseborough Gallery, located at the corner of Roxborough Avenue and Yonge Street, is part framing shop and part art gallery. Hamady's partner and brother-in-law Michael Hamady looks after the framing end, while Cherna is responsible for the artists. Many of them she has known for years.

"Batia Eisenwasser-Jancourt grew up with me in Montreal," she chuckles. The childhood friends met again at the artists colony of Ein Hod in Israel.

Hamady, 51, had left Montreal for Israel in 1964 after marrying a fellow Zionist. She and her ex-husband lived on a moshav near Affula and quickly started a family of two daughters, whom they brought to Canada in 1968 for a three-year hiatus.

It was during this hiatus that Hamady, living in Halifax, took a ceramics class offered by the Nova Scotia College of Art and Design. It was her only formal training. She thought about becoming an artist, and was even accepted into an Israeli art school, but instead moved to Ein Hod to work in the collective gallery.

The Ein Hod Artists Village, where Hamady arrived soon afer the breakup of her marriage in 1971, was founded in the 1950s by artists like Dadaist Marcel Janco. Located south of Haifa, it is now home to about 90 artists and their families. Hamady spent 13 years in Ein Hod, 10 of them as manager of the gallery, organizing international exhibitions and playing den mother to the often temperamental artists.

She married husband Eli Hamady, a Druze, in 1979. They moved to Toronto in 1984 because of problems caused by the intermarriage, the depressed Israeli economy and the lack of career advancement opportunities. "I had reached the top," she says simply.

The Roseborough Gallery is Hamady's first venture into the Canadian art market but already she's making heads turn. Despite ankle-deep snow on the sidewalk, passersby stop to stare at the works hanging in the gallery windows. Canadian artist Steve Kenny's nature canvases are mesmerizing, as are his trompe l'oeil plant stands ($1,000) displayed inside.

Equally eye catching are lithographs by Ein Hod artist Yevgeny Abeshaus. Prints from his Vanity of Vanities series show frock-coated men and women against a surreal landscape dotted by soap bubbles (the hand-colored prints run between $150 and $300 — framed ones are $525). And the figures floating through painter Theodore Tobiasse's work seem familiar. "Actually, they call him the next Chagall," says Hamady.

The Roseborough Gallery is located at 1094 Yonge St. in Toronto. Gallery hours are Monday to Saturday, 10 a.m. to 6 p.m. Call 927-7884 for more information.

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — Ottawa-born artist Cheryl Pagurek started out as a sculptor while studying fine arts at Queen's University in Kingston.

Following her graduation in 1990, she headed west to continue her studies at the University of Victoria, where she obtained her master's degree in 1992, and where she has continued to live.

As she pursued her art, Pagurek began "doing a lot of groupings" of her sculptures, which led to installations. Then she took up photography. Now, she combines the two in an unusual and thought-provoking manner.

Interested in the home as a reflection of personal identity, Pagurek began building installations of domestic rooms for various sites and photographing them.

Originally, she said in a recent telephone interview, these installations were "generic." Her most recent installation, however, is a very personal and loving look at her grandparents' immigrant experience.

First, there is the living room at 5 Fraserwood Ave., Apt. #2, her installation and photographic series at the Hamilton Artists Inc. gallery.

Constructed like a stage set out of painted cardboard, styrofoam and fabric, the room is modeled after her grandparents' living room in Toronto. They are, Pagurek writes, "Polish Jews who left Europe shortly before the Second World War and immigrated to North America."

The "ornate and flowery character of their living room," with its "gilt fixings, busy combinations of patterns and colors, and highly embellished furniture," reflects her grandparents' conception of success and comfort, representing "all that is opposite to the bleakness of their past hardships as immigrants finding their way in a new country, having lost their families during the Second World War."

Beyond the living room is the main gallery, where a series of nine color photographs capture this installation in various sites.

The color photographs come in sets of three, and are printed in three sizes.

In one set, Pagurek superimposes photographs of the installation onto photographs of a garment factory, vividly illustrating the contrast between her grandparents' living room and the factory where they once worked.

Another set shows the living room installed in the Jewish cemetery in Victoria, a juxtaposition, Pagurek writes, that "not only contrasts the private space of the room with a public environment, but also refers to history, heritage, and the constant presence of the Holocaust in my grandparents' lives."

The effect, as one steps from the living room into the main gallery, is startling. One can almost hear the whirring and clatter of sewing machines in the factory, or walk past the edge of the cemetery with its overgrown grass and sad, leaning headstones.

They are a moving and poignant glimpse of the experiences of Pagurek's grandparents and of countless immigrants like them.

Pagurek's grandparents, Bill and Jennie Lieback, still live in Toronto and yes, it's the same living room.

The installation will also be on view at the Agnes Etherington Art Centre in Kingston, Ont., March 20 to May 22.

In Hamilton, the exhibition continues at the Hamilton Artists Inc. gallery, 284 James St. N. until Saturday, Feb. 12. Hours are Tuesday to Friday, 11 a.m. to 5 p.m., Saturday, noon to 4 p.m. For information, phone (905) 529-3355.

Spielberg, film receive awards

LOS ANGELES (JTA) — In what is being considered a rosy augury for this spring's Academy Awards, Steven Spielberg's Holocaust epic, Schindler's List has taken top honors at the Golden Globe Awards for 1993's best dramatic film, director and screenplay.

In addition to the three awards given for Schindler's List, awards were won by the neurotic Jewish television writer and stand-up comedian Jerry Seinfeld for his quirky weekly television series in which he plays himself.

Seinfeld won a Golden Globe as best actor in a situation comedy and the NBC series was chosen as the best comedy series for 1993.

The award for best supporting actress in a television series went to Seinfeld co-star Julia Louis-Dreyfus.

Other winners included Bette Midler for her role in the television film Gypsy and Winona Ryder as best supporting actress in the feature movie The Age of Innocence.

All these actors are Jewish.

BILL GLADSTONE'S EYE ON ARTS

Considering the high profile and multiple accomplishments of Toronto entertainment entrepreneur Garth Drabinsky, it's almost incredible that the authorized biography that Gina Mallet was commissioned to write in 1989 has yet to appear. Is it still a viable project? "The official line is that the book is being finished and will be published," says Mallet, former drama critic of the Toronto Star.

Within a year of Mallet's signing the contract, a boardroom coup d'etat forced Drabinsky out of Cineplex and put the project into temporary deep freeze. However, work began in earnest again in 1990, and by mid-1992 the manuscript was so close to completion that McClelland & Stewart added it to its fall 1992 publication list. Filling in for Drabinsky, Mallet even spoke at an industry sales meeting, reviving interest among booksellers. Then, reportedly, Drabinsky decided the time wasn't right and had the book pulled from the line-up.

M&S publisher Doug Gibson puts a positive slant on the delay. "Books take longer than everyone expects," he says. "As Garth's career continues to develop, there continues to be more to write about. So it's a continuing saga."

Since leaving Cineplex, Drabinsky has continued to be a powerful force in the entertainment world. His company, Live Entertainment, has staged a multi-million-dollar production of Showboat, which has garnered both critical and popular acclaim, and consistently played to sold-out houses since it opened the North York Performing Arts Centre last October. It is slated to hit Broadway in October 1994.

Live Ent's production of Phantom of the Opera recently took a mid-winter break from a Canadian tour to play Honolulu. Currently on Broadway, the company's production of Kiss of the Spider Woman won seven Toni awards last year and took London by storm in 1992. Yet another touring production — Joseph and the Amazing Technicolor Dreamcoat, starring Donny Osmond — is currently playing Chicago.

All this adds up to phenomenal box office. Drabinsky's accomplishments are simply unprecedented for a Canadian showman. So where's the bio?

"It's coming along and I think it might appear this time next year," says Gibson, who adds that Marq de Villiers, author and former editor of the magazine Toronto Life, will complete the manuscript, leaving Mallet free to work on other projects.

Here's an item involving another former drama critic for the Toronto Star — the late great Nathan Cohen — as well as a former drama critic for The Canadian Jewish News, Jeniva Berger. Berger, who wrote for The CJN for seven years during the 1980s, is founding president of the Canadian Theatre Critics Association, which this year is sponsoring the twelfth annual Nathan Cohen Award for excellence in theatre criticism.

Berger continues to write about theatre for various publications. She is the chair of the awards, which consist of two $500 cheques and accompanying framed certificates. Sponsors are Saturday Night Magazine, The Mirvish Foundation and the Toronto Star. Co-sponsors are the Live Entertainment Corporation of Canada and the Ottawa Citizen.

The awards are to be presented Feb. 28. For further information, phone (416) 367-8896.

For those planning a simcha, phone (416) 421-1020 to receive a free copy of the 1994-95 edition of See The Music, a live music directory published by the Toronto Musicians' Association. "It's very important for the public to realize in these times of financial restraint that live music is within everyone's budget," says TMA president John Trembath. "Flip through See The Music, decide on the type of music you want, call the bandleader or musician to get a price and compare it to taped music. I think you'll be pleasantly surprised."

Winnipeg-born celebrity Monty Hall, former host of the TV game show Let's Make A Deal!, returns this year as host of the Variety Club's annual telethon, Feb. 5-6. The Variety Telethon '94 is being broadcast live from the Harbour Westin Castle Hotel on the Global television network. Proceeds go towards helping children with special needs, including kids with physical and mental handicaps, regardless of race, creed or colour. Hall joined Tent 28 (Ontario) of the Variety Club in 1947 and later transferred to Tent 25 (Southern California).

Although Show Boat has won much attention, there is much more than that esteemed musical playing at the North York Performing Arts Centre. On Thursday, Feb. 10 at 8 p.m., the North York Concert Orchestra presents the Choir Connection with the North York Singers in the Recital Hall; featured works include Beethoven's First Symphony and Handel's Overture to the Royal Fireworks.

On Thursday Feb. 17 at 8 p.m., the North York Symphony presents Verdi's Vespri Siciliani Overture, Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, with soloist Ivan Zenaty on violin. For further information, call 872-2222.

Shylock most famous Jew in literature

Shylock is the most famous Jew in literature. He is part of the world's mythology and has been a subject for study by social historians, psychologists and literary critics. He occupies a place in the dictionary where his name is synomymous with lending money at a high rate of interest.

The author of this lively and informative study writes: "In the extent of his fame, Shylock belongs with Don Quixote, Tartuffe, Sherlock Holmes, Robinson Crusoe . . . he is a familiar figure to millions who have never read The Merchant of Venice or ever seen it acted."

Shylock is not a Jewish name and where did Shakespeare get it? Isaac Asimov suggests the following. There is a Hebrew word shalakh, which appears twice in the Bible (Leviticus 11:17 and Deuteronomy 14:17). In both places, birds of prey are being listed as unfit articles of diet for Jews. No one knows exactly what bird is meant by shalakh, but the usual translation into English gives it as "cormorant." The cormorant is a sea bird which eats fish so voraciously that the word has come to mean personified greed and voraciousness. Perhaps Shakespeare used a form of the Hebrew word both as name and characterization of the conflicted and mysterious moneylender.

From the time of his first appearance in Shakespeare's play, written from 1596-98, Shylock has become for both actors and playgoers an object of contempt, humor, pity and rage. It was a favorite play of the Nazis who gleefully used it for vile propaganda.

Gross traces Shylock's origins and background in literature, theatre and political and social history. He wonders how Shakespeare really understood Shylock and wanted him portrayed on the stage and what this chameleon-like personality can mean to us 400 years later.

Did Shakespeare know any Jews? The answer, undoubtedly, is no. Jews were expelled from England at the end of the 13th century. Gradually, a few made their way back but there were only a hundred or so in the time of Elizabeth.

Shakespeare's main aim was to write a play that would amuse and find favor with his audience. He didn't hesitate to make use of the anti-Semitic stereotypes of his age. But to make Shylock merely a villain would distance him from the audience. Surely it would be better theatre to portray him as an ambivalent figure with feelings and concerns that the audience could share. Thus, Shylock becomes a figure of dignity, worthy of sympathy and understanding as he delivers his memorable lines, "Hath not a Jew eyes? Hath not a Jew hands, organs, dimensions, senses, affections, passions? . . . If you prick us do we not bleed?" At least for part of his play Shakespeare's genius transcended the customary and the expected.

The author, former editor of the Times Literary Supplement, and now the theatre critic of London Sunday Telegraph, shows how renowned actors over the years have played Shylock. In the 18th century he was a creature of greed and wolfish cunning until Edmund Kean's interpretation in 1814 evoked a generous measure of understanding and support. Henry Irving's Victorian interpretation displayed a suffering Shylock, a victim of persecution. Other actors — as well as directors — including Olivier, Geilgud, O'Toole and Jonathan Miller have brought their own unique insights to the play — often transforming it in dress and manner to meet the sophisticated needs of a changing audience.

Whether the play should be studied by high school students or produced at Stratford or other festivals remains an unresolved question that the author tackles at the book's end. "It is still a masterpiece," he concludes, "but, there is a permanent chill in the air, even in the gardens of Belmont."

This book is of enduring interest — learned and perceptive — and imparts much information in a manner absorbing and lucid.

Carnegie Hall's still tops among American music halls

By GERRY MORRIS
Special to The CJN

NEW YORK — One hundred-and-two-year-old Carnegie Hall, the dowager queen of American concert halls, is bursting with musical energy, revelling in the splendor of its $60 million restoration. Viewed as one of the rare halls with the acoustics to honor the presence of great artists, it is a veritable Valhalla for world-class musicians.

Without the tireless efforts of its president, violinist Isaac Stern, to save Carnegie from the wrecking ball in 1960, there would be no Carnegie Hall today.

Since its official opening May 5, 1891, when Peter Ilyich Tchaikovsky conducted his March Solennelle, Carnegie has been synonymous with musical excellence. Anton Dvorak, Segei Rachmaninoff, George Gershwin and Leonard Bernstein were just a handful of composers whose performances made Carnegie history.

What made (steel baron) Andrew Carnegie's Music Hall — as it was briefly called in 1891 — truly extraordinary was its dedication to talent, however controversial. Because she was black, Marion Anderson was banned from the Metropolitan Opera House until 1955, as was Paul Robeson, but they performed at Carnegie Hall. Isadora Duncan's scandalous choreography was first seen there in 1939, and Benny Goodman's 1938 concert introduced swing jazz to the concert hall. Carnegie Hall was also a podium for political rhetoric. It was here that an earnest firebrand named Winston Churchill defended British colonialism in the Boer War.

To play at Carnegie Hall was, and still is, to have "arrived." Metropolitan Opera star Leontyne Price said on the occasion of the hall's 100th birthday, "I salute you as a treasured career friend and as America at its greatest."

Judy Garland's comeback performance on May 21, 1961 was one of the most emotionally charged events in the history of the hall.

As a bonus, until March 1, there is a wonderful exhibit at the Rose Museum in Carnegie Hall, with memorabilia from Leonard Bernstein's early life. Maestro Bernstein was Music Director of The New York Philharmonic from 1958-1969. Photographs, letters, clippings, manuscript scores on loan from the Bernstein collection at the Library of Congress and from the maestro's personal archives, as well as a 90-minute audio presentation are available. Also included in the elegantly designed 2,200 square foot exhibition space are mementos of Tchaikovsky's 1891 visit, Toscanini's baton and Benny Goodman's clarinet. Free guided tours of the hall are also available twice weekly.

For any music lover a trip to New York would not be complete without a visit to this magnificent musical edifice.

ONE FLEW OVER THE CUCKOO'S NEST is great theatre and just as relevant now as in the 60's, when some of us first saw it as a movie. There's humour to leaven this story of a petty criminal who fakes mental illness to avoid prison and finds hospital life a nightmare. Don't miss it! Leah Posluns Theatre, 4588 Bathurst Street, 630-6752.

Aufgang Travel, in business since 1949, has actively promoted Israel tourism since 1961. Agent Emile 1961. Agent Emile Aufgang led his first tour that year, and has been back 42 times since. Aufgang Travel handles a cross-section of tourism to Israel, including on many occasions, leading organizations such as Hadassah-WIZO, UJA, UIA and Na'amat. Emile also organizes tours for groups from major cities other than Toronto.

The bicycle tour for Canadian Friends of Hebrew University, which leaves on May 2, is what Emile calls a "mission with a difference." To qualify, you must raise $1,500 for Hebrew University. This tour is similar to English bicycle fundraiser tours, and profits from their experience, but is the first of its kind in Canada. There is medical backup, a spare-parts truck, and even a bus for tired cyclists.

Although Aufgang Travel has a reputation for specializing in Israel, about two-thirds of its business comes from other sources, such as commercial or individual vacation travel elsewhere. Of the travel to Israel, about half is with groups, half with individuals or custom-tailored tours. A tour can include as few as two people, or as many as 500 (the recent Hadassah-WIZO tour had almost 500).

Two tour leaders explained different aspects of his company's ability to give tourists insight into life in Israel.

Alex Serota deals with many groups for whom visiting Israel is not so much a tour as a pilgrimage.The tours he organizes today draw on his five years' experience as chair of the Ontario Division of United Israel Appeal, with itineraries including everything from absorption centres to factories, army bases to moshavim. He deals only with five-star hotels. There are no packages; everything is custom-tailored, whether for individuals or groups.

Gail Zucker specializes in bar/bat mitzvah and family tours. Operating out of Tower Travel, she has worked with Shalom as her wholesaler, and praises his ability to foresee the needs of families and children. She has just returned from a December tour with 28 children and 21 adults. There were four bnei mitzvah and one bat mitzvah, all in the synagogue at Masada. The tour also included Yad Vashem, a jeep drive through the desert near Eilat, and a Red Sea cruise from Taba, where the borders of Egypt, Israel, Jordan and Saudi Arabia converge.

Shalom points out that all bar/bat mitzvah tours are tailored to your individual needs.

TRAVEL TALK

By BILL GLADSTONE

One of my favourite books of Jewish travel is so rare that Toronto's Robarts Library might possess the only copy in Canada. Entitled Mission of Inquiry to the Jews, it's an account by some Protestant clergymen from Scotland about a trip taken in 1839 through Eastern Europe and the Middle East. Their object was to assess how ripe the Jews were for conversion by observing Jewish sites, living conditions and attitudes.

Though parts of the book may seem unkosher to some, the authors regarded the Jews highly and penned many elaborate descriptions worth reading. In 1839, Zionism was strong and there were an estimated 10,000 Jews in the once and future land of Israel, which was then plagued with cholera. There is prescient irony in this description of Sir Moses Montefiore's encampment on Jerusalem's Mount of Olives: "He had fixed a cord round the tents at a little distance, that he might keep himself in quarantine. On the outside of this, a crowd of about 20 or 30 Jews were collected, spreading out their petitions before him. Some were getting money for themselves, some for their friends, some for the purposes of religion. It was an interesting scene, and called up to our minds the events of other days, when Israel were not strangers in their own land."

The report of the return journey through Wallachia, Moldavia, Austrian Poland and Prussia provides rare English-language descriptions of Jews in many villages of present-day Romania, Ukraine, Austria, Poland, Slovakia and Germany. The book gives population statistics, descriptions of towns and the surrounding countryside, and myriad details of Jewish prayer services, synagogues, marriages, funerals, schools, inns, customs and dress. Through conversations with many rabbis and ordinary Jews, a sense of the nationalistic consciousness of the Jewish people emerges.

"Czernowitz is a pleasant town, with streets wide, well aired, and clean. The houses are generally two or three stories high, and there are barracks and other public buildings ... There are 3,000 Jews here, with eight synagogues, only three of which are large. These three we visited, being all under the roof of one large edifice. The congregation were engaged in worship when we entered [and] ... a group soon gathered round each of us at different parts of the synagogue. On saying to those around, 'We have been at Jerusalem,' they were immediately interested, and asked, 'Are the Jews there like the Jews here?' "

Interest in this obscure volume should not be limited to historians. If your ancestors came from Bucharest, Iasi, Cracow, Tarnapol, Brody, Lemberg (Lviv), Hamburg or any of dozens of other places mentioned, this book probably contains insights into how they lived. It also helps us realize how lucky we are, now that debilitating sea voyages, horse-carts, bumpy mud roads, and week-long quarantines are no longer requisite elements of travel.

A more recent book for Jewish travellers is Ruth Ellen Gruber's Jewish Heritage Travel: A Guide to Central & Eastern Europe (Wiley, 1992). This attractive guide provides capsule histories and descriptions of Jewish sites in Poland, Hungary, Romania, Bulgaria and the former Czechoslovakia and Yugoslavia. It also provides useful information regarding climate, currency, language, visas, accommodation and kosher cuisine. Gruber says that the seeds of the guidebook were planted during a trip to Romania in 1978, when she found a surviving great-uncle and the gravestone of her great-grandmother. Unlike the 1839 journey described above, any post-Holocaust voyage to Central and Eastern Europe in search of Jewish heritage must necessarily include sites of Jewish martyrdom, which Gruber does not neglect. She also presents details of many surviving synagogues and cemeteries, not all in derelict condition. Her book is a thorough, poignant catalogue for travellers to Central and Eastern Europe to consult.

Also published by Wiley, Jewish Museums of North America by Nancy Frazier chronicles collections of Judaica in the United States and Canada. The book describes a rich and varied assortment of art, artifacts and memorabilia. Highlights include the house in Denver (now a museum) where Golda Meir once lived; a collection of field recordings of Yiddish folk songs in the U.S. Library of Congress; and colonial-era Jewish-American portraits at the American Jewish Historical Society headquarters in Waltham, Massachusetts. Canadian entries include the Montreal and Toronto Holocaust Remembrance Centres and the Reuben and Helene Dennis Museum of the Beth Tzedec Synagogue in Toronto.

Going to Poland? Several new books for the Jewish traveller have appeared in recent years. Guidebooks to Jewish Warsaw, Lublin and Cracow, published through grants from the Ronald Lauder Foundation in New York, are available through the Jewish Historical Institute in Warsaw. According to Jewish genealogist Miriam Weiner, who has visited Poland numerous times since 1989, new guidebooks to aspects of Jewish culture in Polish cities like Lodz and Lublin are available in various Warsaw bookstores. She recommends the 1992 book Poland's Jewish Heritage, by Joram Kagan. Travellers might also wish to consult the Jewish Travel Guide. Published annually by the London Jewish Chronicle, it lists the addresses of many Jewish entities and organizations around the globe and provides capsule histories of the Jews in almost 90 countries from Afghanistan to Zimbabwe. It's possibly the most comprehensive thumbnail guide to the Jewish world in print.

IAMAT helps to ensure proper medical assistance

By MARC HUBER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Getting sick on a holiday isn't anyone's idea of fun.

It's not just the local strain of Montezuma's Revenge. Armchair athletes at home can increase their chances of injury while on vacation. Snakebites in the middle of a jungle are no picnic either.

But finding reliable medical assistance in an exotic holiday spot is difficult. How can you be sure the doctor recommended by your hotel manager didn't buy his medical degree through the mail? Prudent travellers want professional, competent medical treatment in their own language. It may mean the difference between a cast and a bloodletting.

Fortunately, a non-profit group, the Canadian-based International Association For Medical Assistance to Travellers (IAMAT), can help. Anyone can join and there is no charge for membership other than a request for a tax deductible donation.

IAMAT members can refer to a compact directory listing doctors in 125 countries who speak fluent English or French and are also fluent in the local language. In order to be accredited, IAMAT's doctors must have received their medical training in Europe or North America. Physicians' qualifications and offices are inspected by IAMAT staff before being approved.

On call 24 hours a day, IAMAT doctors charge patients according to the organization's fee schedule for hotel calls ($55 US), office visits ($45 US) and emergency appointments at night or on holidays ($65 US).

The organization was started in 1960 by Dr. Vincenzo Marcolongo, who trained at Montreal's McGill University. While working in Rome, he treated a young Canadian music student suffering from headaches. There were complications from the painkillers prescribed by the original, non-English speaking physician. Marcolongo knew the reaction occurred only among people of Anglo Saxon descent and saved her life with blood transfusions, vitamins and antibiotics.

After this experience, Marcolongo began organizing IAMAT's database. Though he died in 1988, his widow, Assunta Uffer Marcolongo, continues her spouse's work at the organization headquarters in Guelph, Ont..

Like most doctors, IAMAT emphasizes a preventative approach. Members receive a wealth of annually-updated information about global health hazards. Twenty-four world climate charts outline specific climatic conditions throughout the year. These detailed charts contain recommendations for seasonal clothing and indicate the sanitary conditions of water, milk and food in 1,400 cities around the world.

Malaria still remains a concern in many parts of the world. IAMAT provides guidelines on how to avoid the disease along with noting which strains are resistant to chloroquine, an anti-malarial drug. The organization also recommends buying lightweight, portable mosquito nets as the best way to prevent bites from mosquitoes, spiders, assassin bugs and other insects.

Members also receive a clinical record to be completed by their home doctor before departing. This document provides a complete medical history in case of emergencies. All of IAMAT's materials easily fit into an airline ticket folder.

IAMAT plans to construct a conference centre in Guelph, Ont., that will host continuing education programs for doctors around the world. My IAMAT membership card is one more thing I don't leave home without.

Eilat's beaches beckon visitors

EILAT, Israel — Those looking for a new destination this winter should consider Eilat.

Eilat, located on the shores of the Red Sea, offers everything for an enjoyable vacation. Water temperatures remain above 20ºC (68ºF) throughout the year, and there are miles of beaches to enjoy with showers, sunbeds and other modern bathing facilities.

One can also enjoy water and outdoor sports played in the waters and along the beach of this vacationers paradise.

The calm surface of the sea is also ideal for fun boating activities: pedal boats, rowboats, kayaks, self-drive motor boats and banana rides. You can take a one-hour or a full-day cruise aboard one of the many yachts that depart regularly from the Eilat Marina. Deep sea fishing is available, while those closer to shore can marvel at the gorgeous colors and shapes of the coral reefs, among the deepest and most breathtaking in the world.

Accommodation of all types are to be had in Eilat, from luxury hotels to beach bungalows and bed-and-breakfasts. Recent development has doubled the number of rooms available.

With its unlimited supply of sunshine, Eilat has a perfect climate all year round. It rains only six days a year on average. Daytime temperatures rarely dip below 21ºC (70ºF), even in the winter. Sunbathers enjoy full days, either by the pool of their hotel or on one of the many beaches.

Ed Waitzer

He received his LLB and LLM degrees from the Faculty of Law, University of Toronto, and was called to the Bar of Ontario and New York.

From 1977 to 1981 Waitzer worked for the Toronto Stock Exchange as vice-president, Listings and Distributions. Thereafter, he was a partner of Stikeman, Elliott, in their Toronto and New York offices until joining the Commission late in 1993.

Since 1990 he has been an adjunct professor at Osgoode Hall Law School.

He has written extensively on a variety of legal and public policy issues and has served as a director of a number of corporations and community organizations. Waitzer spoke CJN freelance writer Ruth Schweitzer.

CJN: What is the role of the Ontario Securities Commission?

Waitzer: The Commission is an independent statutory agency with two purposes which are interrelated. One is to promote capital market efficiency and the other is to ensure an adequate level of investor protection. I say that the two purposes are interrelated because unless there is an adequate level of investor protection, you will never have an efficient capital market. People have to be satisfied that there is a degree of integrity to the market in order for them to be prepared to participate in it.

CJN: What is its relationship to the government?

Waitzer: The Commission is a creation of statute, but it's fully accountable to government. I'm appointed by the government as are all of the commissioners. Staff are appointed by me. We're accountable to the government for our budget. We have to get approval for the Commission's budget from the government, and we report to the government through the Minister of Finance.

CJN: How is the Commission funded?

Waitzer: The Commission is funded out of general revenues of the government, although the Commission at this point is a profit centre for the government. The Commission generates fees in a variety of ways, such as registration fees, transaction fees; and also generates revenues out of settlements and fines. Right now the Commission is generating approximately twice as much revenue for the government as its budget requires, so the Commission is spending about $20 million a year right now and generates over $40 million a year in revenues for the government.

Waitzer: It's a difficult question because you really have to ask what adequately means. No commission will ever be big enough to ensure absolute integrity in the markets. I think the Commission is big enough to do an adequate job.

One of the difficulties that the Commission faces is that it is part of the civil service and it's faced with all the constraints that the civil service currently faces. To some extent, that limits the ability of the Commission to operate as effectively as it might otherwise. That's one of the areas we are currently focusing on in terms of how to promote organizational effectiveness. But I'm not sure that the problem is size. I think it's more doing what we do more effectively.

There are some areas within the Commission which are currently stretched to the limits, in part because it's been a very busy market for the last year or so. Some elements of the Commission, the registration area, the corporate finance area — just because the volume of transactions that they are handling has gone up dramatically — are quite strained right now. But the industry is cyclical, and people who are very busy right now may not be as busy a year from now depending on what happens in the markets. A lot of what we do is responsive to what's going on in the financial markets.

CJN: What two or three key things do you hope to accomplish during your term?

Waitzer: The most ambitious project that we're focusing on right now, which will likely be the least visible, is what I alluded to before, that is, improving organizational effectiveness within the Commission. It's not an issue that most appointees take on. Very few people who take on a job such as mine for two or three or four years are inclined to focus a lot on administrative matters simply because it's hard enough to get some substantive policy issues through in a short time frame. You never get any credit for doing internal management work because it's not visible, and you're always remembered for your policy initiatives, so most people in my position tend to focus on launching policy initiatives quickly. I told Commission staff that if anything we are going to cut back on new policy initiatives during the next little while to give us a little time to focus on how to make our working environment a more efficient and more effective one and a happier place to work in.

People at the Commission are very intelligent, deeply committed to what they do; they have a strong sense of purpose, and they are significantly underpaid relative to the kinds of salaries that they could be commanding in the private sector. At times, some of the organizational constraints can be quite demoralizing, so I think there is a real opportunity to try to rethink how we do some of what we do and end up with a happier working environment. I would label that as the initiative I'm spending the most time thinking about right now.

There are a couple of other initiatives that I've started talking about.

One is that I think it's essential we start thinking about what we should be doing in the mutual fund area. It's an industry that's grown very rapidly. The regulatory framework hasn't kept up with industry growth, and it's time to catch up a little bit and maybe even get ahead, anticipate some of the issues that are going to arise from this exponential growth.

The other area I've been talking about is quite a bit more technical. It relates to trying to develop a truly integrated disclosure system. Right now, the securities law framework focuses heavily on the prospectus, which is the document that's prepared in connection with an initial offering of securities, as being the defining event in securities law. So for example, liability provisions in the statute are much more onerous if there is a misrepresentation in a prospectus than would be the case if there is a misrepresentation in a press release or a quarterly report or any of the other continuous disclosure obligations. I think the Commission would work much more efficiently and the market would work much more efficiently if we had an integrated disclosure system that de-emphasized the prospectus as being the defining event in the securities offering process. So that's another significant policy initiative that I'm trying to develop some support for amongst market participants.

CJN: Are the recent takeovers by banks of trust companies, investment dealers and investment counselling firms a concern?

Waitzer: It's an issue that relates to the two objectives I was talking about earlier — market efficiency and investor protection. It's an issue that relates to market efficiency because it impacts on market structure and the ability of companies to raise money and investors to invest.

The industry structure has been and is changing quite dramatically. Financial services is a highly dynamic sector of the economy. Many trust companies have disappeared. Many currently predict that insurance companies will be acquired by banks and many of the large securites firms have already gone that route.

It raises concerns about competition, about potential conflicts of interest, and about market innovation. There are a whole host of issues that come out of changing industry structure, and yes, they are very much of concern to the Securities Commission.

Waitzer: Canadians have always enjoyed access to some of the most sophisticated markets, intermediaries and financial instruments in the world. Even though Canada is itself a relatively small market, there are many Canadian issuers and investors who are very familiar with and taking advantage of a wide range of derivative instruments in order to hedge or invest or for a variety of other purposes.

Does that create regulatory concerns? Well, the biggest challenge for regulators in the financial services sector is to keep up with the rapid level of innovation that's taking place within the market. So the Commission has spent a lot of time trying to understand how these instruments work and get a feel for what regulatory implications flow from their use. The Commission isn't doing that by itself. We work closely with other securities and financial regulators around the world. Regulators generally are getting a much higher comfort level as to the risks that are posed, both systemic risks and capital risks, and the appropriate regulatory responses to some of those risks.

I should also say that most of the sophisticated users of these instruments — and by and large the instruments are used by sophisticated investors — have an equally good grasp of what they're doing, and we haven't seen in Canada any significant failures or crises resulting from the use of derivatives to date.

CJN: Recent surveys in the United States and Canada show that the majority of people think mutual funds are government guaranteed. Please comment.

Waitzer: That's very much a concern to us. There are a variety of reasons why there's been this massive transfer of funds from bank deposits essentially into mutual funds. For one, we're at a point in a cycle where interest rates are low and the equity markets have been quite buoyant, so it would become very attractive for investors to transfer their funds from savings bonds or GICs or savings accounts to mutual funds. It's become clear that many of those who do so are focusing on relative or absolute yield rather than on risks.

Last week, in the New York Times I read a survey of investors who had shifted money from banks to mutual funds. The survey indicated that 90 per cent of the investors had been told specifically when they made their investment in the mutual fund that the mutual fund wasn't guaranteed or insured. Of the 90 per cent who were specifically told, 50 per cent of them still believed that in some way or other their investment was guaranteed by the government. But the risks go beyond this false belief that they still enjoy some kind of guarantee or insurance.

Many new investors into mutual funds don't understand the volatility, don't understand the fact that their investment may go down or up in value, they don't understand the risks relating to liquidity, and they don't understand there are risks associated with their ability to redeem their mutual fund units.

So there's clearly the need for public education. It's a real challenge to do it in a market environment like this, where the appeal of mutual funds is so high. The banks interestingly enough have been doing quite a good job at public education, in an effort to retain some of their deposit base in their own mutual fund products, so I think the level of public education is going up quite dramatically. The Investment Funds Institute of Canada, which is the association that represents most of the investment fund managers and distributors, have also been doing a lot of work in this area. They recently put out a half-hour videotape; they've been publishing a lot of educational materials. It's quite good. So hopefully we'll achieve a higher level of public awareness before the markets crash and people are disappointed.

CJN: Canadians are increasingly looking outside of North America to invest. What are the implications regarding our securities regulations and foreign investment?

Multi-million dollar firm plans U.S. expansion

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

When Max Lacob, a South African-born entrepreneur, bought a secretarial school as a business venture for his wife, he never dreamed he would turn the school into a multi-million dollar computer training company.

"I had no intention of going into the education business," he said in a recent interview.

Lacob, 51, and his partner, Ben Shtang, 58, run the Academy of Learning, a company which originated in South Africa. They have developed a training system for teaching adults to use the standard computer software found in most offices.

The first Canadian Academy of Learning opened in 1987. There are now 78 franchised locations across the country and five centres in the U.S. Last year the company, which is based in Richmond Hill, had sales of $12 million.

The Academy of Learning, which is the brainchild of Lacob, grew out of his wife's secretarial school. In 1984 he gave up an executive position at a large electrical distribution company in Johannesburg. He started a personnel business which he operated out of an office in the secretarial school. Lacob eventually quit this business to run the school.

He noticed the school was attracting mature students who wanted computer skills; he had discovered an untapped market. "There was a huge potential market if someone could come up with some system for the consumers of the 1980s — adults looking for computer training," he said.

Max Lacob

Ben Shtang

Lacob recognized that adult students needed to learn at their own pace so he devised a flexible training program. He bought the rights to a typing program based on audio tapes, which he adapted for computer training. He also introduced written exams to measure the students' proficiency.

The Academy of Learning was enormously successful in South Africa. Within two years there were 16 centres, all of which were franchised. In 1987 Lacob sold the business to immigrate to Canada, where he felt his children would have a better future.

In Toronto, he teamed up with Shtang, a friend and former business colleague, to launch the Academy of Learning in North America. Shtang was in the midst of selling a profitable lighting manufacturing business and was ready for a new venture. "I was very excited by the whole concept of the Academy of Learning," he said.

They started a small experimental school with 10 computers to test the Canadian market. By the end of that year they had established four more centres; three years later there were 39 and today there are 78. There is no other career school in Canada with such rapid growth.

Lacob and Shtang have an ambitious expansion plan for the U.S.: they expect to franchise up to 400 centres in the next three to four years.

Lacob and Shtang attribute their success to the excellence of their product. "We get results," said Shtang. They call their training formula an "integrated learning system," which is a hands-on approach to learning. Students follow instructions by the audio tapes and workbooks and learn through doing the exercises. They have to master each step before they can advance. If they get stuck an instructor is always available to help them.

The program also has high performance standards. All students must pass written exams to complete their courses. A certificate from the Academy of Learning means that a student has reached a certain level of proficiency. All exams are marked at head office to maintain franchise-wide standards.

The head office does not keep figures on the number of people who find jobs after completing their courses. Those records are kept by the individual franchises. Parin Jaffer, the operator of an east-end centre on the Danforth, said that up until 1991 students had a 75-80 per cent placement rate. She does not have new figures, which are lower as a result of the recession.

Larry Jacobs, 37, a full-time student at the Danforth centre, expects to have some difficulty finding a job in February when he will have completed a six-month diploma program in office administration. However, he is very positive about his training.

"I find that the hands-on experience is the best way of learning. I'm satisfied that I have learned quite a bit," he said.

Jacobs said he is getting good value for his money, and his course does not come cheap — the tuition of the administrative assistant program has set him back $4,300. Full-time students like Jacobs are eligible for government loans from the Ontario Student Aid Program (OSAP), because the Academy of Learning is a licensed private vocational school.

As well as the full-time diploma program, there are short skill-upgrading courses. An 18-hour course in WorldPerfect will be in the $200 range, while the most expensive course, the diploma in microcomputer business applications, costs $4,400.

Business from private students accounts for about 50 per cent of the company's sales. Government and business contracts are also important sources of income. Around 40 per cent of the company's revenue comes from government training contracts for full-time diploma program. The individual franchises compete for lucrative training contracts with government agencies like the Canada Employment Centres and the Workers' Compensation Board.

Contracts with private businesses account for around 10 per cent of the company's business. Large corporations like the Bank of Montreal, Ford and General Motors have sent their employees to the Academy of Learning for short courses to upgrade their skills on popular business software.

Economic News From Israel

Average Income Up

JERUSALEM — The standard of living of the average urban family improved significantly over the past six years, both in terms of income and consumption, according to the Central Bureau of Statistics' preliminary findings based on the 1992/93 family expenditure survey.

The gross average income of urban households during the period of the survey was 6,130 shekels ($2,040) a month, a real increase of 17.5 per cent since the last survey, six years ago.

Taxes and National Insurance Institute payments consisted of about 19 per cent of this, bringing net income down to 4,315 shekels ($1,470).

The average household spent approximately 5,700 shekels ($1,900), adjusted to current prices, in goods and services, including housing. This reflects a real increase of 9 per cent in consumption expenditures compared to six years ago.

When housing is excluded, the average household consumption expenditures reached about 4,590 shekels ($1,530), growing by 15 per cent over inflation during the past six years.

These changes reflect the dramatic improvement in the standard of living in the past six years. The difference also shows how the urban population's consumption behavior has changed as their income has risen, as well as the prices of the goods and services they purchase.

Privatization Proceeding Quickly

The highest profile firm likely slated for privatization is El Al. Up to 51 per cent of its shares could be sold on the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange by the end of this year.

Israel Ship Yards will be completely out of the government's hands by May. Over the summer, 26 per cent of Bezeq's shares, Israel's national phone company, will be available on stock exchanges in Tel Aviv and other locations.

Windows on the World

ISRAEL — For Microsoft Israel, Windows is a success in any language.

The company recently introduced to Israelis a multilingual version of the popular computer program. Users can operate simultaneously in Hebrew, English, French, Russian and Arabic.

Israel was selected as the test country for multi-lingual Windows because the Hebrew edition sold so well.

Microsoft Israel invested about $1 million (U.S.) to develop its five language innovation.

Iacocca Drives A Hard Bargin

HAIFA — Former Chrysler Corporation president Lee Iacocca can't keep away from cars.

His company, Laser Enterprises Technology recently struck a 10 year, $100 million (U.S.) deal to market a driver-assistance device manufactured by the Haifa-based Ramat Silioon firm.

Called Contolaser, the Israeli safety tool warns drivers when they're too close to another vehicle. There is also a warning mechanism for low visibility situations.

Iacocca wants to install the product in American-made cars and also sell it to private customers.

These business briefs were compiled from information supplied by the Israel Economic Mission in Toronto.

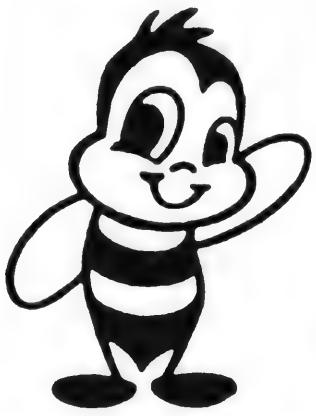
Billy Bee: flying on the wings of success



By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — While it might strike many that exporting honey to Israel, the land of milk and honey, is like bringing coals to Newcastle, one gets the feeling Eli Grossman doesn't regard the notion as impossible.

Selling honey to Israel won't happen anytime soon — the Jewish state's domestic honey lobby is powerful — but Grossman, general manager of family-run Billy Bee Honey Products Ltd. of Toronto, proudly notes that a big sale to Israel of Billy Bee Honey Barbecue Sauce and Honey Mustard is just around the corner.

"It's 99 per cent complete. We're ready to go with our first order to Israel," says Grossman, whose father Jack founded Billy Bee some 40 years ago and even came up with the cute bee logo with which the company's products are identified.

It's taken a long time, but Billy Bee's patience with Israel's often maddening bureaucracy is about to pay off. Supersol, Israel's largest grocery chain, has agreed to an initial order of 2,000 cases of the Canadian-made sauce and mustard.

Various marinades

Actually, Billy Bee, today run day-to-day by company president Jack Grossman's three sons, was ready with its shipment months ago. Freight, a local distributor and a customs broker were all in place. But glitches involving Hebrew labels and gaining Israeli kashruth certification delayed matters. (Although all Billy Bee products are COR certified in Canada, they must undergo local inspection in Israel).

As well, anyone exporting a food product to Israel must go through the country's health ministry.

With the red tape now more or less out of the way, Israel will become another in a long list of countries to savor Billy Bee products. Those include Japan, France, Pakistan and about 20 others.

One roadblock was Israel's import tariffs, which for these products range from 30 to 50 per cent in order to protect local agricultural interests. That's why the Grossman brothers — Eli, sales manager Ralph and Leonard, the plant supervisor — are strong proponents of a Canada-Israel free trade pact.

Even though Israel's honey producers have managed to keep foreign competitors out, Eli is confident that once other Billy Bee products get a toehold and build brand recognition, the company's staple product could one day be on Israeli shelves.

Billy Bee managed to get around Israel's strong tomato lobby by touting its barbecue sauce as a unique product. "We are the first honey barbecue sauce in Israel," notes Ralph.

Six months ago, the company introduced honey roasted peanuts and will soon add honey-lemon drops and various marinades to its 20-strong product line. Its diversification has paid off: Billy Bee grossed over $20 million last year, up 15 per cent from the year before. It's been the largest honey packer in Canada for years.

The Grossmans are also counting on the cachet Western products seem to have in Israel.

As for doing business with the Jewish state, Eli counsels patience.

"Go right to the customer first. Sell the product first. Then get approvals," he says. "There's no point getting the green light if no one buys the product. But patience is the main thing."

Waitzer: It's almost trite to say that markets are increasingly global, just because that's been the case for a long time. Largely due to the impact of communications technology, the barriers, other than regulatory barriers for a Canadian investor or a Canadian issuer to access other markets, are minimal. There are frequent examples.

Rogers Cable is one example of a Canadian company that has raised billions of dollars in the U.S. market because there isn't a well-developed market in Canada for unrated debt or more junior debt.

Similarly, Canadian investor demand for foreign securities has led to the proliferation of various foreign equity funds and bond funds, and foreign advisers coming into Canada one way or another.

All of that leads to the need for greater regulatory cooperation and harmonization, which I think is actually taking place quite naturally and well.

CJN: What is the relationship between the Securities Commission here and the one in Israel?

Waitzer: There isn't a formal or institutional relationship. I have a personal relationship with the chairman of the securities commission in Israel. He's a friend, and we've spent quite a bit of time talking about investment flows.

Increasingly, I think there will be interest amongst Canadians and Americans to identify investment opportunities in the Israeli market. The Israeli stock market has also been quite buoyant during the last little while, both as a result of privatizations and optimism as to the prospects for economic development as the peace process matures.

He has done yeoman's service in introducing a serious securities regulatory framework into that market in very short order. Israel enjoys many advantages that Canada does, for instance. Israel enjoys a trade agreement with the United States as does Canada, so it wouldn't surprise me over time to see bilateral treaties between Canada and the United States and Israel to reduce barriers and have more investment flows between the countries. I think it'll take a little time for the Israeli market to mature to that level, but as I say, he's done quite a remarkable job.

Duberman gets shot at the big league

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — First he's up, then he's down. A few days later he's back up, only to be sent down again shortly afterwards.

No one should be surprised if in all the comings and goings, Justin Duberman begins to feel a bit like a yo-yo on a string. But the 23-year-old winger is certainly not complaining, not when being called up means being put on a line with future Hall of Famer Brian Trottier and getting to practice with the Magnificent One, Mario Lemieux.

For Duberman, getting the call up from the Cleveland Lumberjacks, the Pittsburgh Penguins' farm team in the International Hockey League (IHL), to the big club is just another step on the road he hopes will lead him to a permanent spot in the National Hockey League (NHL).

So far, the 6 foot 1, 185 lb. winger has played four games in the big league on a line with Trottier and rookie hopeful Ed Patterson. His stats are slim — no points, no penalties and only two shots on goal, but even cracking the Penguins' talent-laden (though injury-riddled) lineup has to be considered a feather in his cap.

Duberman, who was born in New Haven but who grew up in Chicago, said his third-line duty meant "we went out there, kept [the puck] in their end, made a lot of bodychecks and tried to outwork" the other team.

"It was a great experience playing with Trottier," he said in a telephone interview from the Lumberjacks' practice facility. "He's been an idol of mine.

"I always thought he was an unselfish player and everywhere he plays, he wins. He made me feel comfortable on the ice and gave me some pointers."

Duberman said making the transition from "the I" to the NHL was fairly comfortable, since the Lumberjacks play the same style the Pens do. As for his own approach to the game, Duberman describes himself as "a pretty hard worker in the corners, and I have some skill with the puck. If I'm fortunate to play in the NHL, I'll continue to work hard."

He says he's not put off by the daunting prospect of cracking the Penguins' star-studded lineup. "I want to be part of a winning team and if I have to wait, I'll wait," he said. "I want to play on a cup-winning team."

Unfortunately, Duberman missed out at a chance of playing on a cup-winner last year with the Montreal Canadiens. He was originally selected by the Habs in the 10th round of the 1989 entry draft, 230th overall, out of the University of North Dakota (UND) where he spent four years on an athletic scholarship.

During that time, he didn't play with the Canadiens or their farm team but in his senior year at UND, he tallied 17 goals and 27 assists for 44 points in 39 games. Duberman said he chose UND because of its record in churning out NHL-calibre players like Ed Belfour, Troy Murray, James Patrick, Dave Tippett and Dave Christian.

Duberman was acquired by Pittsburgh as a free agent on Nov. 2, 1992 and spent the season in Cleveland. Last year with the Lumberjacks, he bulged the twine 29 times and set up 42 others for 71 points in 77 games. He was the club's fourth-leading scorer and tops among Lumberjacks' rookies.

During his amateur career, Duberman was one of the last cuts of the U.S. Olympic team. Prior to that, he stuck with the U.S. national team for 17-year-olds, playing on a team that included future NHLers Jeremy Roenick, Tony Amonte and Keith Carney.

Like many other young athletes, Duberman is grateful to be getting the chance to make it in the big league. "I'm getting paid to do something I'd do for free," he said. "The game's been really good to me. To be a professional athlete is great."

JDC-led convoy evacuates 296 out of Sarajevo

ROME (JTA) — Just hours after a mortar killed at least 68 civilians in the worst atrocity committed in the 22-month siege of Sarajevo, a Jewish-organized, multi-ethnic convoy successfully brought nearly 300 people from the embattled Bosnian capital.

The six-bus convoy, organized by the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC) in partnership with Sarajevo's Jewish La Benevolencija organization, brought 296 Jews, Croats, Serbs and Muslims on a tortuous overland journey overnight from Sarajevo to Makarska, on the Croatian coast, where JDC maintains a refugee center, JDC officials said.

The group included men and women of all ages, and a few children. Among the evacuees was an elderly Muslim woman who has been designated a Righteous Gentile and her family, who have been invited to live in Israel.

Included in the convoy were 176 Jews, leaving about 300 to 350 Jews in the city, the JDC said.

The 50 or so Jewish evacuees who say they want to live in Israel are being processed in Makarska by the Jewish Agency.

"We are so happy to have been able to bring this convoy out," JDC President Ambassador Milton A. Wolf told JTA by telephone from Makarska.

"The convoy brought out not only Jews but a multi-ethnic group that including Christian Serbs and Croats as well as Muslims," said Wolf.

"Our joy in bringing out the convoy, however, is tarnished by the terrible tragedy of the shelling Saturday," he said. "It took place as our convoy was preparing for departure, and people who just got off the buses say it was horrible."

Wolf extended thanks to the governments of Bosnia-Herzegovina and Croatia, to Serbian forces, to the United Nations Protection Force and to the Jewish communities of Sarajevo and Zagreb, Croatia, for their help in setting up and making possible the evacuation.

He also thanked the government of France, the European Jewish Congress and the Central British Fund of London for their help.

"It was an event that had to be orchestrated — a Herculean effort," he said. "Everyone was very cooperative."

The first of the six convoy buses was just leaving Sarajevo at 12:30 p.m. Saturday when the deadly shell hit Sarajevo's central market, killing 68 and injuring at least 200.

"They decided to make a run for it and got three buses out," Wolf said. "Then there was a delay before the last three buses were able to leave."

Delegates will assess progress

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

OTTAWA — Senior Israeli and Palestinian officials, including Yossi Beilin, Israel's outspoken deputy foreign minister, are in Canada this week for talks aimed at mapping progress in the multilateral round of Mideast peace negotiations.

Some 30 delegates from 10 countries and the European Union (EU) are scheduled to meet at the Chateau Montebello resort near Hull, Que. from Feb. 8 through 10 to try and resolve differences outstanding after two years of talks on the multilateral track.

The five separate multilateral rounds were devised under the October 1991 Madrid formula for Mideast peace talks, which also called for simultaneous bilateral talks between Israel and the Palestinians, Syria, Lebanon and Jordan.

Negotiators are composed of the steering committee of the multilateral rounds, of which Canada is a member. In fact, Canada chairs the round on Mideast refugees, a thorny subject that includes calls from so-called diaspora Palestinians — those who left or who were expelled after 1948 and 1967 — to return to Israel.

Two rounds of talks on refugees took place in Ottawa in 1992 and one each last year in Oslo and Tunis.

The chairs of the other four rounds — the United States, which holds the gavel on the water and arms control rounds; Japan, which chairs the talks on the environment, and the EU, under whose aegis the talks on regional economic development have taken place — are all represented in Montebello.

Also attending are delegates from Jordan, Egypt, Saudi Arabia, Tunisia, Norway and the EU.

Representing Canada is Marc Perron, assistant deputy minister for Africa and the Middle East and this country's top Mideast diplomat.

Perron called the refugee talks "the most difficult" of the five multilateral working groups. But "there have been some real results."

He said Canada is working toward disproving rumors in several Palestinian refugee camps that there has been a secret deal between Israel and the PLO to do nothing for the thousands of Palestinians who fled or were thrown out of the new Jewish state in 1948.

Canada has earmarked $55 million over the coming five years toward the improvement of Palestinians' lives in the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

Ottawa has also facilitiated several projects, including a rainwater catchment scheme, the creation of an updated refugee data bank and the repatriation of up to 4,000 Palestinian refugees from Egypt to Gaza, Perron said.

Canada chairs the next round of refugee talks in Cairo in May.

The talks are "open discussions, with no protocol," said Eli Yerushalmi, counsellor at the Israeli Embassy. "It's mainly a brainstorming session."

The last meeting of the steering committee was held in December in Tokyo.

Friedberg's murderers receive life sentences

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

JERUSALEM — The murderers of Jason (Yehoshua) Friedberg, the Montreal-born soldier shot to death outside Jerusalem last March, have been sentenced to life imprisonment.

The three Palestinians, all members of the Fatah faction of the PLO, confessed to the murders of Friedberg and three other Israelis.

They were charged with the deaths of 24-year-old Friedberg, high school students Lior Tubol and Ronen Caramani, and taxi driver Rafi Doron.

"No punishment — not even the death penalty — can atone for the [accused's] crimes," said Jerusalem District Court Judge Yaacov Bazak. "They took the lives of innocent victims in cold blood."

Before sentencing, one of the accused defended his acts, saying they were political and not criminal. He was cut off by the judge amidst the angry cries from relatives of the victims.

After the trial, Johad Bolus, the lawyer for the accused, said he hoped such acts would no longer take place now that Palestinians and Israelis had embarked on a path of peace.

Friedberg, a member of the elite Golani brigade, was returning to his base near Tel Aviv when he was abducted and shot to death in March, 1993.

The recent immigrant from Montreal had two weeks remaining in his army service when he was killed.

Unified Jewish state seen a must for Israel

Israelis starting to question religious beliefs

By LORI DENNIS
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Israel is a state for Jews but if it is to survive the future — particularly the long-awaited peaceful times ahead — it must become a Jewish state as well, says the director of Israel's Bet Midrash, a training centre for Israeli rabbis and educators within the Masorti movement.

"Israelis are already beginning to ask questions about the meaning of life. When you have a gun to your head, there's no time to ask. But as we move toward peace, they're beginning to ask tough spiritual questions — questions about their religious beliefs and their identity as Jews," said Rabbi Harvey Meirovich.

Rabbi Meirovich recently addressed an audience at Beth Tzedec Synagogue in a presentation organized by the Canadian Foundation for Masorti Judaism.

Masorti is a growing religious movement with over 40 congregations in Israel ranging in size from 40 to 200 families. It is based upon the ideals and practices of Conservative Judaism within the framework of modern society. Its ultimate goal is to build a triad between Judaism, Zionism and modernity in order to achieve a Jewish state.

"Presently, we have a very divided Israel" said Rabbi Meirovich. "Twenty per cent of Israelis identify themselves as Orthodox or ultra-Orthodox, 45 per cent are secular and 35 per cent consider themselves to be Masorti, but not in the traditional sense that I view the movement."

Rabbi Meirovich said Orthodox Jews are a boon to Judaism but discourage modernity by not acknowledging science, literature and archeology as an important part of their children's education. He said secular Jews voice an absolute "yes" to Israel and modernity but "no" to religion.

"The greatest enemy of the Jewish people is the Jewish people," he said. "There are so many factions and issues dividing us within Israel. Each group is vying for ultimate power. . . If we continue to move in our present direction, in my opinion we will create a state of Hebrew speaking goyim.

"The problem, as we see it within the Masorti movement, is that with religious fundamentalists, there are no questions allowed. And with secular fundamentalists, there are no questions necessary."

Masorti founded the Bet Midrash 10 years ago. There were only six students. Today there are over 200 and the program is running neck and neck with Hebrew University. Next year, the projected enrolment is more than 300.

Then there is Tali — a Hebrew acronym which stands for the enrichment of Jewish studies for Jewish children. Tali is a school system, much like United Synagogue Day Schools or Bialik, except that it operates within the public school system. A group of Israeli parents discovered they had the right to format 25 per cent of their children's education, and developed a school system to enrich their secular education. What began as a single school 16 years ago is now a 30-school system, with 10 more schools to open this year. Tali hopes to reach 40,000 children within five years.

"The Bet Midrash is doing some very exciting things and has a lot of responsibility on its hands," said Ron Hoffman, secretary of the Canadian Masorti Foundation. "While it is training the Tali teachers and writing its curriculum and text books, the seminary also plays a key role in the evolution of Conservative Judaism around the world."

Hoffman said the Bet Midrash did outreach programs to the former Soviet Union.

"As close to half a million Russian Jews have migrated to Israel, they have come with an incredible thirst for knowledge about their heritage. The Masorti movement appeals to the intellectualism of the Russians more than Orthodoxy does because they are tired of being dictated to," he said.

Cancer fighter Farkas-Himsley succumbs to disease

'Giving and loving' — Dr. Ricky Kanee Schachter

Prof. Hannah Farkas-Himsley

TORONTO — Prof. Hannah Farkas-Himsley, who for a large part of her life was dedicated to combatting cancer, recently died of the disease in her Jerusalem home. She was 76.

The soft-spoken microbiologist was based in Toronto, where she worked to isolate a naturally-occuring protein that kills cancer cells and viruses. The protein, produced by certain bacteria, is being tested on psoriasis and skin cancer, with a possible application to the AIDS virus.

Dr. Ricky Kanee Schachter, a friend and the former head of the Dermatology Centre at Women's College Hospital, worked closely with Farkas-Himsley.

"She was a very beautiful woman, not only physically but beautiful throughout. She was giving and loving in all of her contacts — a cultured lady who was interested in music and the arts and an avid reader," said Schachter.

"But most of all, she was a scientist who worked hard. Nothing stood in her way, not even her illness, as she continued to work in her research and the route it led her to enlarge and enrich her knowledge."

Farkas-Himsley was born in Moscow during the Russian Revolution. Her family made aliyah in 1926 when Farkas-Himsley was 8. She served in the Haganah and studied biology and bacteriology at the Hebrew University on Mount Scopus. She earned her PhD in 1946.

In 1940, she married Prof. Ladislas Farkas, a Hungarian physical chemist and head of the Middle East Scientific Council who was invited to Palestine by Chaim Weizmann. He was killed in a plane crash in 1948 while en route to Europe to buy equipment for Israel.

The young widow had two daughters, Leorah, 4, and Ruth, nine months. She joined the Department of Bacteriology at the Medical School in Jerusalem. In 1953, she became the scientific attache at Israel's embassy in London where she organized

Toronto Crown attorney to visit Yugoslavia to examine rape charges

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Laura Silver says she's going to the war-torn former Yugoslavia to investigate allegations of widespread rape for really one reason: she's Jewish.

"It just struck me as something so important," says Silver, a Toronto Crown attorney, of her imminent one-month mission to Slovenia and Croatia. There, she will interview women who claim they have been raped and tortured in the bloody ethnic war that has torn the former Yugoslavia into pieces.

Silver and two other female colleagues from the downtown Toronto Crown's office will leave at the end of February. "It's naive to believe there will be no risk," Silver, 35, told The CJN. "But we've been assured of our safety by UNPROFOR [the United Nations Protection Force] and it's supposed to be relatively quiet in Zagreb [The Croatian capital]."

Silver's Jewish background motivated her to volunteer for the mission. "The Holocaust is part of our heritage. I was always taught it should never happen again," she said. "I didn't have to explain it to my parents, who are not Holocaust survivors. For me, this was something I felt I had to do.

Will visit refugee camps

The three lawyers were chosen when their boss was asked by a representative of the United Nations if there were any volunteers in his department with experience in sexual assault cases.

Six came forward and three were picked by a UN commission to make the trip. The commission was set up in October 1992 to gather information on violations of international humanitarian law in the former Yugoslavia.

One of the qualifiers, said Silver, was that the UN wanted women, presumably because Muslim women won't speak about rape to men.

Silver is further qualified because since last year, she has prosecuted only those cases involving child abuse.

Under the investigation's terms, the team will go to detention and refugee camps to interview women who have alleged widespread sexual assault. The women are from all sides of the Yugoslav conflict — Serb, Croat and Bosnian Muslim — but will be mainly Muslims.

"These [allegations] are happening to people perceived to be our enemies," Silver says, "but that doesn't matter."

The investigation will also extend to claims of torture, execution and other violations of humanitarian law.

The team, which will include psychiatrists and psychologists, will report back to the UN security council with its findings.

Laskin named to Appeal Court

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

John I. Laskin

TORONTO — Human rights advocate and longtime community volunteer John I. Laskin has been appointed to the Ontario Court of Appeal. He will be sworn in March 2.

Laskin leaves the firm of Davies, Ward & Beck where he has served as head of the litigation department since 1984.

During his almost 23 years at the bar, Laskin has been involved in a number of leading cases in the field of constitutional law — in many of them, acting pro bono (without taking a fee).

"I've always had some sympathy for the underdog," he told The CJN.

His most recent case involves five families with children in Jewish day schools who are challenging the provincial policy of denying public funding to Jewish schools while providing full financial support to Roman Catholic schools. A decision in that case has been reserved by the Ontario Court of Appeal.

Earlier, Laskin represented Canadian Jewish Congress in a number of human rights and constitutional cases. The Bill 30 reference, in which Congress was an intervener, asked the Appeal Court to rule on the proposed extension of Catholic school funding through Grade 13.

In other cases, he has argued against religious prayers and instruction in Ontario schools (practices which were overturned by the province's Court of Appeal) and he has represented Congress at the Supreme Court of Canada in the Jim Keegstra case, arguing for the constitutional validity of the anti-hate law.

In the Simpson Sears vs. O'Malley case, the court agreed with his contention that discrimination occurs when a rule of employment, though applicable to all employees, adversely affects minorities.

Laskin said that while he has donated his time to arguing legal issues affecting the community, "at the same time, the community gave me an opportunity to argue some of the most fascinating cases of our time."

He said his late father, former Supreme Court Chief Justice Bora Laskin, served as a key inspiration to him and "he instilled in all of us the importance of public service."

Laskin said he was "pretty excited and a little overwhelmed" by the prospect of serving on the province's highest court. "It's the final court in [Ontario]," he said. "They make decisions that affect people's lives. It's a daunting task."

In addition to publishing numerous papers on legal issues — including defamation, human rights and wrongful dismissal — he has served on a variety of professional organizations.

He has been a member of the Canadian Human Rights Tribunal, a member of Canadian Lawyers and Jurists for Soviet Jewry, the Congress subcommittee on the constitution (1981-82) and community relations committee. In addition to his other pursuits, Laskin has been an occasional contributor to The CJN.

High Court hears Yom Kippur case

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Supreme Court of Canada last week heard the case of three Jewish teachers from Quebec who claim their right to practise their religion, as guaranteed by the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, is violated by their school board's refusal to allow them paid leave for Yom Kippur.

Joseph Kadoch, Louise Elbaz and Jacob Lahmi, it was argued, are subject to discrimination because the board's Catholic teachers do not lose any salary for the time they are absent for their religion's holidays, such as Christmas and Good Friday.

The case, which was won on appeal by the Commission Scolaire Regionale de Chambly in the Quebec Court of Appeal in June, 1992, was brought to the Supreme Court by the teachers' union, the Syndicat de l'Enseignement de Champlain, an affiliate of the Centrale de l'Enseignement du Quebec (CEQ).

The union's lawyers Claude Melancon and Georges Marceau say a decision could come down in anywhere from a few weeks to a few months' time.

"The school calendar of the Commission Scolaire Regionale de Chambly allows for a certain number of paid religious holidays, but only those of Catholics," Marceau said.

The teachers are also seeking reimbursement of the paid days they have lost over the past 10 years.

They are asking the Supreme Court to decide if Catholic school boards must accommodate the religious holidays of their non-Catholic employees and, if so, in what way.

In addition to the constitutional issue, Melancon said a second question raised by the case is whether a labor arbitrator is entitled to interpret the law — and make mistakes — without judicial review, an issue of keen interest to Quebec unions.

The union believes the school board could accommodate the Jewish teachers either by allowing them to take off Yom Kippur as one of the three days a year teachers can be absent for "personal reasons" or by rearranging their schedules in order that they could put in their 27 hours per week on other days.

"No one is asking that the Jewish teachers have more paid days off in the year than the other teachers," he said.

The three teachers are not seeking time off for any other Jewish holidays.

The dispute goes back to 1985 when the teachers' union filed a grievance on behalf of the three employees after they were docked a day's pay for being absent on Yom Kippur.

That was the year the school board decided that observance of a religious holiday was not a legitimate reason to be absent for personal reasons as they had in the previous two years.

The teachers' union pointed to a clause in their collective agreement that the school board must "respect the exercise of the fundamental rights of the teachers without distinction."

"Personal reasons" spelled out in the collective agreement include such things as getting married, attending a funeral or taking care of a broken furnace, Melancon said, as well as a general discretionary clause giving the board power to accept other reasons.

A labor arbitration tribunal ruled 2-to-1 almost two years later that the school board discriminated against the three teachers, citing the freedom of religious practice enshrined in both the Canadian and Quebec rights charters, and not made "reasonable allowances" for the teachers' need to not work on Yom Kippur.

The school board lost its appeal of the tribunal's decision in Quebec Superior Court, but won on another appeal to the Court of Appeal in 1992.

Melancon said a Supreme Court ruling on this case will help clarify how far an employer must go to accommodate an employee's request to be absent from work for religious reasons.

The question is how to balance the employee's constitutional right to practise his religion against the employer's right not to suffer "undue hardship" in accommodating him, as has been established in similar cases, Melancon said.

NAME GAME

There is a story in almost every Jewish surname and Toronto lawyer FRED M. CATZMAN has been researching their origins over the past few years. Mr. Catzman reports on his research in The CJN.

SALUTIN

Rick Salutin is a columnist for The Globe And Mail. He enjoys a reputation as a perceptive analyst and critic.

I am pleased to report that my original misconception that Rick was probably descended from a humble soldier has been happily resolved. His surname actually derives from Seluytin, a shtetl in the province of Vitebsk, which makes him a good Litvack.

GROPPER

Lony Gropper of Toronto has been unable to trace the origin of his name. I share his problem.

I can only guess that it originates from Grabar (tanner in Ukrainian), which also appears in the form of Graber. . . .

Shabbat Zachor '94 brings renewed hope

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

Farrah Sebbagh

Natan Shaya

TORONTO — Last year at this time, Judy Feld Carr sounded a message of hope: that the next Shabbat Zachor, the special mid-winter Sabbath of remembrance and prayers for Syrian Jewry, would be the last.

This year, there's an extra bounce in Carr's voice, for now, she's more hopeful than ever that in the coming months, every Jew who wants to leave Syria will be able to do so.

The numbers may bear out Carr, the tireless long-time chair of Canadian Jewish Congress's National Task Force for Syrian Jews. Since appearing to have opened its doors just a crack to Jewish departure two months ago, 14 Jews left in December and 94 in January.

Add to that the roughly 2,600 individuals who left when the door was ajar from April to October of 1992, and that leaves a community of about 1,100 souls, mainly in Damascus but also in Aleppo and Qumishli.

Of those, nearly everyone now holds an exit permit, Carr says. But here's the catch: Authorities appear to be playing the same mind-game in which the Soviets engaged in the late 1970s and early 1980s — splitting families.

The Syrians still have not issued the precious documents to several families and to "a few" Jewish children, Carr told The CJN, thereby making it that much more difficult for their parents and siblings to leave.

That's why Jewish communities across Canada and in several other nations will commemorate Shabbat Zachor on Feb. 19 as a day of prayer for Jews in oppressed lands, particularly Syria.

"I'm praying this will be the last time, that we can bring this to an end," Carr says. But she adds that if the straws in the wind prove accurate, Syria's Jewish community will be reduced in the coming months to a core of between 200 and 250 people — the elderly, infirm or those who simply won't leave whatever the opportunity.

For one thing, there's still a lot of fear among Syria's Jews, whose movements and communications are monitored around the clock by the dreaded secret police; who are prohibited from holding certain official jobs and — a key plank of Syrian terror — who are not allowed to sell property.

That means any departing family cannot sell a house or business. Only personal effects may be sold. (Ironically, Judaica cannot be taken out of the country; all unused religious objects go to the government).

Other restrictions — a family may only take out the equivalent of $2,000 (U.S.) and two suitcases per person — mean those who leave do so with very little. A proud people, Syrian Jews are reluctant to accept charity once most of them arrive in the large Syrian emigre community in Brooklyn.

Professionals must retrain and, of course, there's the language problem.

So fear of the future, when Syrian Jews have so much to fear from the present, is what's keeping some in the country from leaving, Carr explains.

Another problem is that because they leave on travel visas, Syrian Jews going to the United States arrive as visitors, not as refugees, and are thus denied the many advantages refugee status confers.

Some go to Panama, Brazil or Mexico. For those who remain, there is one mohel left but there is no shoichet for a very observant community.

Syria's on-again, off-again policy on travel for Jews was discussed in a December meeting between U.S. Secetary of State Warren Christopher and Syrian President Hafez al-Assad. The Syrians reportedly pledged to issue visas to all remaining Jews by the end of that month.

Destruction of Amalek

On Shabbat Zachor, Jews pray for the destruction of Amalek, the archetypal enemy of the Jewish people throughout the ages.

And since its inception in 1975 at Toronto's Beth Tzedec Congregation, Shabbat Zachor also marks the yahrzeit of six Syrian Jewish youths murdered while trying to escape the country in 1974.

Sisters Mazal, Laura and Farrah Sebbagh, their cousin Eva Saad, Natan Shaya and Kassem Abadi were betrayed by their Arab smugglers, who had been paid to spirit them across the Lebanese border.

The girls were reportedly raped, killed and their mutilated bodies put in sacks and dumped on their parents' doorstep in Damascus's Jewish quarter with a note saying, "Here are your children."

Guest speaker at Beth Tzedec on the 19th will be Prof. Howard Troper, co-author of None is Too Many, who will speak on Syrian Jewry: A Canadian Jewish Responsibility.

For Carr, the winding down of her 23-year, largely personal campaign on behalf of Syrian Jews is bittersweet. "It's the end of an astounding Jewish community, which numbered 40,000 before World War II," she says. "Except for Morocco, it's the last Jewish community in an Arab country today.

"But I'm hoping desperately this [campaign] comes to an end."

Yaqzan slams Jewish organizations

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — "For the vast majority of people, the proof of six million having been killed lies in the pictures of a few thousand skeletons and a few thousand emaciated prisoners of war shown on the screen. But that is hardly proof. . . As for the Jews wishing to destroy Christianity, it would seem a very natural thing for them to do."

It appears that despite being heavily censured for a newspaper article in which he downplayed the seriousness of date rape, former University of New Brunswick (UNB) professor Matin Yaqzan continues to spew the kind of provocative rhetoric that landed him in hot water in the first place.

In a recent letter to the Saint John Telegraph Journal, Yaqzan rose to the defence of former Moncton school teacher Malcolm Ross, arguing that his views of the Holocaust and of an alleged Jewish conspiracy to destroy Christianity are "within the realm of possibility."

Yaqzan, who took early retirement in the wake of the outrage his date rape article provoked, called Ross "a far superior role model for his students than his critics or the vast majority of teachers. . . He is certainly far superior to the teachers who are homosexuals and are despised by many of the parents."

In a broadside aimed at Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith Canada, he accused them of "bearing false witness" against Ross and for "using the media to create the mass hysteria against [him]."

Yaqzan's latest letter prompted Congress spokesman Bernie Farber to criticize the Telegraph Journal for publishing it, saying the "letter belongs in the racist rags which bigots receive in plain brown envelopes."

In a signed editorial, Gerry Childs of the Telegraph Journal agreed with Farber's assessment of Yaqzan's views. But, he said, the paper decided to publish Yaqzan's "venomous propaganda" out of a desire to bring to the public's attention the kinds of views espoused by the former professor.

In addition, Childs said the paper felt bound by the right to free expression, adding it did not wish to give Yaqzan the opportunity to claim he was being silenced or was a martyr to the cause of freedom of speech.

Yaqzan first gained national notoriety after writing an article in the UNB student newspaper in which he suggested that some women accept monetary compensation for the "inconvenience or discomfort" of date rape. Prior to that, he had penned various letters that defended Ross and which attacked Jews as revenge-seekers and of exercising "undue influence" over political figures.

NAHON convention set for March

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — North American High School Organization Network, better known as NAHON, will be holding its ninth annual national convention from March 3-6 at the Howard Johnson's Hotel in Kingston, Ontario.

The activist organization for Jewish high school students, formed 12 years ago in Toronto, has a presence in Canadian cities including Vancouver, Winnipeg, Calgary, Toronto, Montreal and Moncton.

Issues concerning NAHON students include Jewish identity and Holocaust remembrance. The NAHON task force formerly known as the Oppressed Jewry task force was recently renamed the Oppressed People task force to reflect students' concern for those living in war-torn Bosnia as well as in other trouble spots around the world.

"The main goal of NAHON is to make Jewish students aware of their Jewish identity... and of how they can help solve problems in the Jewish community," said Melanie Shore, one of five convention co-ordinators.

Scheduled convention speakers include Eli Rubenstein, director of young leadership development, United Israel Appeal; Julius Ciss, director of Jews for Judaism; Howard Katz, national director of Network Canada (the Canadian arm of World Union of Jewish Students); and Steven Shulman, associate director, community relations, Canadian Jewish Congress Ontario region. A representative of Yachdav, a Montreal group for Jewish homosexuals and lesbians is also scheduled to speak, as is a representative of Auberge Shalom, a Montreal shelter for abused women.

Among the issues to be addressed at the convention are the Middle East peace process, Israeli politics, student leadership, assimilation, intermarriage and neo-Nazis.

Notes Shore, "It's not just sitting there listening to speakers. There will be workshops, simulations, games."

A choice of egalitarian or traditional Shabbat services will be offered. The cost ($130 from Toronto including transportation by chartered bus) will include all meals, which will be kosher.

For further information or to register call the NAHON office at 416-783-1165 or Josh at 416-223-8677.

Additional charges laid against two Montreal men

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Rabbi Meyer Krentzman's troubles with the law deepened last Friday when he and co-accused Andor Galandauer had four additional charges laid against them in connection with the production of fake passports and other illegal documents.

At the same time, Galandauer was charged with possession of a wide array of prohibited arms, including assault weapons associated with military and police use, and the improper storage of 31 firearms with ammunition.

The two already face seven charges each related to trafficking in cocaine and heroin, for which they have been denied bail. In a separate case, Rabbi Krentzman is scheduled to appear before a judge on April 27, in connection with two fraud-related charges involving a cheque for more than $88,000. Those charges were laid more than a year ago.

Speaking to reporters outside the courtroom after the charges were laid, Galandauer's lawyer Leonard Waxman tried to squelch rumors that his client and Rabbi Krentzman are involved in shipping arms to Israel, possibly for the defence of militant settlers in the territories, or in any sort of gun trafficking.

"These allegations are not supported by the facts...The evidence is to the contrary," Waxman said.

Waxman stated Galandauer has been a gun collector for many years and has "a permit for each and every one" of the guns he owns. He acknowledged, however, that Galandauer may not have complied with all of the more restrictive gun laws passed last year, which ban or require modifications to certain arms.

"Ignorance of the law is no defence, but negligence is not the same as trafficking."

In a separate scrum with reporters, Detective Sgt. Roger Granger, the ballistics expert who laid the weapons charges, was noncommittal in response to questions on whether charges of drug trafficking, illegal weapons and phony passports add up to some kind of international conspiracy.

"I can't comment on what these weapons might be used for. That would have to be investigated," Granger said. "But the law says that to obtain registration you have to know how the gun functions."

What is certain, he said, is that they are not for hunting or target practice.

One of the guns, because it is largely plastic, is difficult to detect by airport x-rays, Granger said. He told reporters that bullets capable of piercing bullet-proof vests were among the more than 10,000 bullets he said police found. He also said that no guns were found that could be loaded with some of the magazines seized.

Granger said that many of the long arms are expensive, worth up to $1,500, including one with a laser sight valued at $1,000 alone.

In a court deposition, MUC police allege that they found equipment for the purpose of producing fake passports, stamps and other documentation at a fabric pleating business owned by Galandauer on de Gaspe Street.

The deposition also claims that they found an illegally obtained video camera and micro-relay.

The other two charges against Galandauer and Krentzman relate to the discovery by police last March of illegal written documentation to obtain passports for Larry Aguebor and Rose Mary Aguebor. Crown prosecutor Mario Dufresne said Larry Aguebor is a convicted criminal now serving a jail term.

According to a list supplied by the Montreal Urban Community police, the illegal weapons in Galandauer's possession included 13 large-capacity cartridge clips; 16 Shurikens; one Munchaku; two Bush Master rifles; one Heckler & Kuch rifle with four large-capacity magazines; two large-capacity Glock pistols; a large-capacity Smith & Wesson pistol; and a large-capacity Heckler & Kuch pistol.

Galandauer, 45, was in his second year as parnass of Beth Zion Congregation at the time of his arrest in January. Rabbi Krentzman, 49, davened at Beth Zion, occasionally giving the Dvar Torah at services. He conducted the synagogue's parallel High Holiday services in 1991 and 1992, but was not otherwise employed by it, said Yechiel Glustein, chairman of the religious committee.

Glustein deplored linkages made in some media between Rabbi Krentzman and Beth Zion, whose rabbi is Sidney Shoham.

Rabbi Krentzman was executive director of the Jewish Education Council of Montreal for almost 10 years, and later national director of the Canadian Zionist Federation and Montreal director of Jewish National Fund for much shorter periods. He left JNF in June 1991.

It was Glustein's committee that appointed Galandauer to the parnass position. "He was an exemplary member of the congregation for many years, attending services regularly, and of good character. We had no reservations about him."

Rabbi Yonah Rosner, president of the Rabbinical Council of Canada's Montreal wing, of which Rabbi Krentzman is a member, said the organization is stunned, but will not censure him for the time being.

"We are allowing him the presumption of innocence...But it is a shock and a great tragedy."

Rabbi Krentzman had been responsible for the weekly inspection of the eruv surrounding Cote St. Luc and St. Laurent until his arrest, Rabbi Rosner said, and it has been difficult to replace him.

He said that a "considerable amount of money" has been collected from individuals to help Rabbi Krentzman's family. He and his wife have five children.

Clarification

The Ahavas Chesed Social Service Centre, the subject of an article in the Jan. 27 CJN, should not be confused with the Association Ahavat Chesed, another registered non-profit Jewish organization in Montreal.

Founded in 1982, Association Ahavat Chesed works anonymously, its volunteers raising money in the Jewish community which they distribute to the needy. Cheques are sent at the beginning of every month and at holidays. The intention is that the recipient not know who is giving them the charity.

JUDO TAKES OFF IN ISRAEL

Ehud Olmert

For 28 years, Teddy Kollek and the city of Jerusalem became almost synonymous. It seemed nothing could break his hold on the city's mayoralty but in municipal elections last November, Likud Knesset member Ehud Olmert, 48, unseated Kollek, 82, and took over the reins in one of the world's most beloved and disputed cities. A corporate lawyer by training, Olmert was first elected to the Knesset in 1973 and he joined Yitzhak Shamir's Likud government in 1988 as minister of health. Prior to the election of Yitzhak Rabin's Labor government, he held various cabinet posts and became known in North America as an articulate spokesman for Israel, appearing on many news and current affairs programs. Olmert was in Toronto recently where he spoke with The CJN's Paul Lungen.

CJN: What is the reason for your visit to Canada?

Olmert: I am on my way from New York to Los Angeles on a short speaking tour, and I was asked to stop in Toronto [for one day] to meet with some friends who supported my campaign. That is the main purpose, but I'm also using [the trip] to talk about the problems and challenges facing Jerusalem. I think this is of concern to all Jews everywhere.

CJN: What are the problems and challenges facing Jerusalem?

Olmert: Well right now Jerusalem is becoming the most sensitive topic on the item of negotiations with the Palestinians [who are] demanding political status in the city. This threatens the integrity and unity of the city and is something we have to try to oppose.

CJN: How can you as mayor oppose that negotiating position?

Olmert: First of all, as mayor I represent the people living in Jerusalem and their voice must have a certain significance in the direction the talks go. That's number one.

Number two, I believe that the mayor has enormous political power to do things in the city which may bear in a certain way on the availability of political solutions.

CJN: In practical terms, what can you do that will effect the future disposition of Jerusalem in the negotiations? Is it by setting up communities that would make it impossible to divide the city?

Olmert: For instance, yes.

CJN: Do you have specifics in mind?

Olmert: I have it, but I don't want to disclose it.

CJN: Have you begun to do anything that will impact on the negotiations?

Olmert: Well you must understand that. . . I have no interest in interfering with the negotiations. It seems that would not be required because the government's explicit, public position is identical to mine. So here I don't think the problem is in opposition to the government, because I have no particular interest to oppose the government or to declare a war against the Israeli government. It is the legitimate government of Israel and whether I always agree with the government or not, I stand behind it.

I'm talking about creating such facts that even when there will be a demand by the Palestinians, and I think it will be sooner rather than later, that we will not allow anything to happen that contradicts the fundamental interests of the State of Israel.

CJN: By that it seems you're implying that the Israeli government would give in to the Palestinians, whereas you as mayor...

Olmert: No, I'm implying the opposite. I'm implying that since the government's position is identical to mine, maybe at one time what we do will only be helpful to the government. I don't imply that they want to withdraw from certain parts of Jerusalem. I definitely hope they won't.

CJN: Are you working then in concert with the government, sharing a plan with the government?

Olmert: I don't have to act in concert with the government entirely, but I'm entitled to pursue my policies within the context of the powers of mayor in the city, and that's what I'm doing.

CJN: What are your main objectives as mayor of Jerusalem in dealing with the day-to-day issues that confront the residents?

Olmert: First and foremost is to keep the integrity and the unity of Jerusalem. Although this is also a national objective, it's definitely also the objective of the mayor on a local basis.

My next priority is education, followed by expanding and improving the road system in Jerusalem. Together with that is economic development.

CJN: I understand that you want to set up a Jerusalem stock exchange. Can you tell us about that?

Olmert: Some discussions have already started.

One of the purposes of my visit now is to pursue with NASDAQ (stock exchange) some type of involvement by them in our efforts. They called me [here in Toronto] following some inquiries that I made. They're interested and I'm going to talk with the president of NASDAQ later in the day.

CJN: Do you have a time frame in which you want to set up the exchange?

Olmert: I want to do it as soon as possible. I think it will attract the business community to Jerusalem even more. One of the day-to-day problems of the city is that for some reason, Jerusalem is outside mainstream business in Israel. That needs to change. We need to strengthen the economy of the city.

The economic expansion [and upgrading of] the infrastructure is very important. Having more companies registered in Jerusalem with their headquarters in the city will be very important.

CJN: Does Israel have room for two exchanges (the first is in Tel Aviv)?

Olmert: Why not? There are 300 applications on the waiting list for public issue waiting for approval at the security exchange commission. This gives you some idea of the dynamics of the money market in Israel. So definitely, there is room for another exchange.

CJN: It's been reported that you owed your election to a great extent on the strong support of Orthodox voters and that you might be beholden to them to implement their agenda. You mentioned education as one of your priorities. To what extent does that refer to improving the allocations to Orthodox education?

Olmert: First of all, it was very popular to [attribute] my victory over Teddy Kollek by the wide support I received from the haredim (ultra-Orthodox). However, a close examination of the figures of the landslide proves that even if there hadn't been one haredi vote supporting me, I'd still have topped Teddy by 3,000 votes. So, the popular notion that I could become mayor only with haredi support is not true.

I made an agreement with the religious parties and the first principle of this agreement states that there will be no change in the status quo on religious matters. Indeed, the haredi parties are interested in the fair allocation of funds for their education system. And this is something they are entitled to get by virtue of their numbers.

I don't think that giving haredi Jews their fair share in the education system, relative to the number of kids who study in their system, is in any form or manner a religious coercion or surrender to their demands. The fact that they didn't get it until now was discrimination, which I do not support.

Had someone said that the Arabs in the east of Jerusalem were not entitled to allocations relative to the number of pupils that go through their school system, everybody would say this is discrimination, apartheid and what not. But when it comes to Jews, it becomes religious coercion. What does it have to do with coercion?

CJN: There are reports also that you might be under pressure to extend Sabbath observances, close roads during Shabbat, perhaps close cinemas or clubs that want to open. Are you under any pressure along those lines?

Olmert: The only pressure I get is from the secular press that is anxious to build up pressure in order to justify their initial reaction and predictions. Any other pressure does not exist.

CJN: Does that mean if a club owner wanted to stay open on a Friday night, he would be able to do so without any problems?

Olmert: First of all, clubs are open on Friday night without any change.

CJN: What about new club owners?

Olmert: First of all they have to apply. I haven't received one application since I was elected.

CJN: Are you saying that if someone did apply and wanted to open a club or a movie on Shabbat, he would have no problems?

Olmert: If it will meet the parameters set in the past according to which other clubs and restaurants are open, then they will be allowed.

CJN: How would you describe the relationship in Jerusalem between the secular and the Orthodox? Are they on good terms or is there friction between them?

Olmert: I think relations are fair and comfortable and I don't expect to have any undue tensions. I don't see any reason for this.

CJN: Jerusalem is well-known as the home to three great religions. Sometimes they don't get along so well. Has that been a major concern of yours, to make sure they live in peaceful and tolerant manner.

Olmert: They do, and I just have to make sure they continue to. The temptations are many. You have to be able to keep the balance and remember the ultimate goal. The ultimate goal is not to surrender to the pressures of the day, and to keep good relations among all of them, with respect, dignity and sensitivity.

CJN: During your campaign you criticized Teddy Kollek for not doing enough for the Arabs of East Jerusalem. What are your plans now in that regard?

CJN: Does that mean that Jewish and Arab communities of the same size will get the same resources, the same road repairs, the same sewers?

Olmert: Precisely.

CJN: Have you been criticized inside the Jewish community about that?

Olmert: No one criticized me for that. They only criticize me when I want to apply the same criteria for the haredi Jews. Then some people say, "religious coercion." But when I talk about the same things with regards to Arabs, everyone says how liberal I am.

CJN: What impact will the recent accord between Israel and the Vatican have on Jerusalem?

Olmert: It will [have an impact]. It was just signed. It's a matter of time, but we expect an increased number of pilgrims coming.

CJN: There must be enormous pressures on you as mayor of one of the world's great cities. How do you manage to cope with it without it driving you to distraction?

Olmert: Look at me. Do I look paralyzed, like someone who can't withstand some pressure? I ran against Teddy Kollek, against the government of Israel, against the Labor Party which is in power, against all of them put together without any party lined up behind me. I ran as an independent. I raised all the funds for myself, I didn't get one penny from my party and I defeated Teddy Kollek. So why do you think I should have any problems?

Public life is demanding but I don't come without a certain degree of experience. I have accumulated experience in the last 20 years in parliament. I held important public positions in the Knesset, in the cabinet and I think I came ready for the job.

CJN: Do you actually enjoy the pressure?

Olmert: No one enjoys the pressure endlessly. You learn how to cope with it. I don't get excited every time someone leans on me.

I always remember the story of Menachem Begin who once noticed that one of his assistants was very upset. He asked him, What happened, why are you upset?

And he said, There are so many pressure from all sides and it's so tough. And Begin said, I'll tell you what you should do. Put the pressure in the other direction.

And that's what I tell my staff all the time. Put the pressure back and don't get excited. They are pressuring us, we will pressure them. That's all.

CJN: What is your vision for Jerusalem? What would you like it to be like in 10 or 20 years?

Olmert: Jerusalem will be the most dynamic city in the world. It will flourish. It will become the silicon valley of the Middle East. Today we already have the basis for it with a growing number of hi-tech companies that have their bases in Jerusalem. There will be plenty more in the near future.

It will be the tourist centre of Israel. Ten thousand more hotel rooms are being built in the next five years. And it will be the political centre of the Middle East, as it always was in many ways.

CJN: The 3,000th anniversary of Jerusalem is coming up in 1996. What are some of the plans for that event?

Olmert: We are going to announce soon what the plans are. There is going to be one year of celebrations that will emphasize the historical background of Jerusalem as King David's city and its significance to Jewish life, with an emphasis also on its centrality for other religions. We will also emphasize that the freedom of access to all holy places is an integral part of the policy of Israel and the city. And we hope that millions of tourists will come to visit us in 1996 as part of the celebrations.

Farrakhan lashes out at U.S. Jewish group

WASHINGTON (JTA) — Outrage and revulsion rippled through American Jewry last week when the controversial Minister Louis Farrakhan of the Nation of Islam refused to distance himself from — and even appeared to support — anti-Semitic remarks made by a top aide.

At a news conference last Thursday, Farrakhan announced he was dismissing the aide, Khalid Abdul Muhammad, not for the message but for the manner in which it had been delivered.

Farrakhan also strongly attacked the Anti-Defamation League, which had publicized Muhammad's remarks.

"Louis Farrakhan's words at his press conference spoke for themselves. It was classic anti-Semitism," ADL national chair Melvin Salberg and national director Abraham Foxman said in a statement.

B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights, the ADL's counterpart in this country, said in a statement that it agrees Farrakhan "is a classic anti-Semite who has been responsible for the distribution in Canada of virulent hate propaganda attacking not only Jews but Catholics and the gay community as well.

"Unfortunately," the League added, "the Nation of Islam and Louis Farrakhan also have credibility among some African-Canadians."

David Harris, executive director of the American Jewish Committee, said his organization was "repulsed by Louis Farrakhan's comments. It is the same old bone-chilling hate delivered with a smile."

And Henry Siegman, executive director of the American Jewish Congress, said that "Farrakhan not only reaffirmed the essential validity of what Muhammad said but repeated for the television audience and the press the distortion of Jewish history which has become the stock weapon in his anti-Semitic arsenal."

Amid heavy security at a downtown hotel here, Farrakhan said he considered Muhammad's speech to be "vile in manner, repugnant, malicious, mean-spirited and spoken in mockery of individuals and people, which is against the spirit of Islam.

"While I stand by the truths that he spoke, I must condemn in the strongest terms the manner in which those truths were represented," Farrakhan said.

"I have warned my brother Khalid several times about his manner of representing the truth," Farrakhan said.

The National Jewish Community Relations Advisory Council said, "By deliberately choosing to ignore that his aide's speech was quintessentially racist, anti-Semitic, anti-Catholic and homophobic, Minister Farrakhan proves that his own message is inherently racist."

In his remarks, Farrakhan ripped into the ADL, calling it "anti-black and even anti-American."

Louis Farrakhan

Farrakhan charged that the ADL aimed "to destroy the reputation and character of Louis Farrakhan in the eyes of the world, and to ultimately destroy the Nation of Islam."

Farrakhan had been under growing pressure to distance himself from Muhammad's comments, which were made Nov. 29 at Kean College in New Jersey.

In the speech, Muhammad said that Jews were "sucking our blood in the black community," that Jews controlled the White House, the media and the Federal Reserve, and that they brought the Holocaust on themselves.

Farrakhan said Muhammad had been invited to the college to discuss the controversial Nation of Islam book The Secret Relationship Between Blacks and Jews.

In the course of the news conference, Farrakhan offered a spirited defence of the work, saying he agreed with "the truth of this book."

The book includes a discussion of the alleged Jewish role in the slave trade.

Last Wednesday, Rep. Kweisi Mfume (D-Md.), head of the Congressional Black Caucus, said the caucus was distancing itself from a previously announced "sacred covenant" with the Nation of Islam.

"It is clear that the Congressional Black Caucus' ability to work for change with the Nation of Islam (is) severely jeopardized as long as there remains a question by some of our membership about the Nation of Islam's sensitivity to the right of all people and all religions to be free from attacks, vilification and defamation," Mfume said.

Also last Wednesday, the Senate, by a vote of 97-0, passed a resolution sponsored by Sens. John Danforth (R-Mo.) and Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) condemning Muhammad's speech.

JDC-led convoy evacuates 296 people out of Sarajevo

Saturday and arrived in Makarska at 10:30 a.m. Sunday, he said.

Torrential rains and mudslides on the narrow winding roads across the mountains slowed the convoy and disrupted radio telephone contact between the buses and Makarska, Wolf said.

"It was incredible weather," he said. "There was no contact with the buses. They were late [and] we didn't know what had happened, so we started out on the road inland looking for them and met up with the first bus about 10 or 15 miles from Makarska."

Hartaga-Susic is a Muslim who was designated Righteous Among the Nations by Yad Vashem in recognition of her rescue of Jews during World War II.

Israeli Foreign Minister Shimon Peres personally intervened to help gain permission for Hartaga-Susic and her family to be evacuated, by formally inviting all of them, in the name of the Israeli government, to live in Israel.

The evacuees had been allowed to bring only a couple of suitcases with them.

The strain of the grueling overnight trip and of life in besieged Sarajevo was evident on their faces.

"They looked tired, exhausted — but happy," Wolf said. "There was great joy on arrival, embraces, tears — particularly in light of the terrible shelling Saturday.

"Some of the evacuees were met by family members — it was very, very moving.

"You go through many experiences in a lifetime, but when you see human beings being saved, being brought to freedom, it makes you feel that you are doing something with your life," he said. "And, of course, this is another instance of the JDC fulfilling its mission."

The evacuation convoy was the latest in a series of air and land evacuations executed by the JDC, the operational organization for overseas Jewish aid, since the beginning of hostilities in Bosnia. These evacuations have transported about 2,200 residents of Sarajevo of all religions and ethnic groups to safe havens.

Wolf said that because of the difficulty in organizing the convoys, at this time no further evacuation was planned.

"Unless there is a real strong request for another convoy, we'll wait," he said.

Israeli minister resigns over failed health proposals

JERUSALEM (JTA) — Israel's health minister has resigned following the cabinet's rejection of a health care reform measure he had strongly backed.

Last week, the cabinet endorsed a decision of the ruling Labor Party to reject health care legislation that would have broken the link between two of the party's longtime sources of influence, the Histadrut trade union and Kupat Holim Clalit, Israel's leading health maintenance organization.

Ramon had argued that the Kupat Holim-Histadrut connection was the single most potent cause of the Labor Party's unpopularity.

Beilin clarifies his remarks

JERUSALEM (JTA) — Deputy Foreign Minister Yossi Beilin insists that he wants Jewish fundraising for Israel to be reformed and not destroyed, and that he seeks a new, more honest Israel-Diaspora relationship.

He says those who characterize his campaign otherwise are distorting it out of self-interest or fear of changing the status quo.

At the same time, however, he acknowledges that changes will be painful.

Beilin, who's in Canada this week to sum up the last two years of multilateral Mideast peace talks, unleashed a fury last month when he told an international Zionist women's group that Israel was a relatively wealthy country and should not continue asking for Diaspora "charity."

Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin subsequently gave a speech in which he became so angry about Beilin's remarks that he knocked one of the microphones off the podium.

Rabin since has tried to contain the damage he clearly believes Beilin has done. In speeches to visiting Diaspora groups, and in a letter-writing campaign to U.S. Jewish leaders, Rabin has gone out of his way to reaffirm the importance Israel attaches to Diaspora philanthropy.

Two weeks ago, in a speech to Hadassah leaders, he said to disregard such "noises" by "youngsters" who do not represent the position of the government of Israel.

Indeed, Rabin is making a point of calling on Jewish communities in developed countries to intensify their efforts to help finance the absorption of hundreds of thousands of immigrants and would-be immigrants from the former Soviet Union.

Meanwhile, Rabin, Jewish Agency officials and others have angrily protested that Beilin does not have the faintest understanding of the critical role of Diaspora fundraising.

They say its value goes far beyond the checks written and the programs sponsored. They point to the North American-Israeli partnership it offers in the building of the Jewish state, which provides a vital component of Jewish identity.

Yehiel Leket, head of the Jewish Agency's department of youth aliyah, argued heatedly with Beilin on the question of Diaspora fundraising during a recent Knesset committee meeting.

"I told him that he may understand Palestinians, but he definitely has no understanding of Jews," said Leket.

Rabin, Leket and others also claim that relieving North American Jews of their responsibility to contribute to Israel threatens the $3 billion in aid provided annually by the U.S. government.

By and large, Beilin has been dismissing the explosion over his remarks in part as a result of media distortions that claimed he was out to abolish the Jewish Agency and its international appeals.

Leket said that is disingenuous. He and others claimed Beilin has repeatedly argued that the Jewish Agency should be dismantled, and then backed down when the heat turned up.

Beilin was concerned enough about the brouhaha to call a few members of the Jewish media to his Knesset office last week to clarify his position before meeting with Jewish leaders last week in the United States.

The remarks to the Women's International Zionist Organization (WIZO) were made, Beilin explained, because "I felt it was necessary to deliver the message that Israel is (no longer) this poor country which needs charity."

"We do not need charity, we need partnership," he said.

Continuing to portray Israel in a dismal light as a fundraising tactic may hurt prospective immigration, he added.

But interpreting his remarks as a call to abolish the United Jewish Appeal is "really nonsense," he said.

Beilin explained that he wants to "restructure" the Israel-Diaspora relationship, against the background of the peace process and Israel's growing economic and strategic strength. and the crisis of Jewish continuity in the Diaspora.

The combined phenomena mean "we have to change the agenda of our relationship with the Diaspora," he said. "That's why I raised the issue."

But, he added, "suggesting changes is met with a kind of criticism which paints you as somebody who would like to destroy rather than reform." That, in turn, serves to protect institutions from change, he said.

"Of course, I'm not speaking about destruction," he said. "I speak about changing priorities in the Jewish appeal and the structure of Jewish organizations."

Beilin envisions an international organization based on the Jewish Agency, but performing "some functions not met today (and) cancelling some functions which are performed."

Existing appeals, he said, should address themselves to "the most important issue" — the threat to Jewish continuity in the Diaspora — and Israelis should be involved in the discussion, since "it is in the national interest of Israel to preserve Jewish continuity."

The money from the appeals can and should help pay for immigration and absorption, he said, but the bulk of it should be funneled to Diaspora Jewish education and visits to Israel for young people.

The other issues currently addressed by Diaspora philanthropy, such as agriculture and Israeli children in distress, are "mainly for Israel to deal with," he said.

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — A campaign is underway for funds to rebuild the Moscow shul destroyed in a fire late last year.

Maryina Roscha, a 90-year-old Orthodox synagogue was located in the Marina Roshche neighborhood of Moscow and was one of three synagogues serving the approximately 180,000 Jews living in the city.

Mark Sapir, a Toronto businessman born in Russia, who with his wife Julie and Rabbi Yoseph Zaltzman of the Jewish-Russian Community Centre are among several Torontonians intent on raising money to rebuild the shul, says that the loss of Maryina Roscha Synagogue is a tragedy for all Russian Jews. "This is a synagogue that lasted all 70 years of the Communist regime and kept underground Judaism alive in the Stalin era. It was a place where any Jew could get shelter, find a minyan and daven. It was the soul of Jewish life."

He added that during the Communist regime, the synagogue taught rabbis and scholars who then went across the country teaching other Jews what they had learned. "Of course, all this was illegal. The fact that it survived all these years is remarkable."

Bearded boys

Sapir, who spent the past Yom Kippur at Maryina Roscha, said that just prior to Kol Nidre, over 100 boys entered the synagogue for prayers. "These boys were bearded and I could see the Yiddishkeit in their faces. I enjoyed their davening so much that I forgot how cold it was inside the building. I later learned that they were students of a yeshiva at the shul.

Julie Sapir says that not only was the synagogue a spiritual centre under the leadership of Rabbi Berel Lazar, it also contained a women's mikvah, an operating room to perform a brit millah and the yeshiva, and served as a centre for the Jewish homeless living in Moscow. "A kitchen in the shul served meals daily to hundreds of schoolchildren as well as 100 elderly and infirm, and distributed 2,000 food packages weekly to the needy. Kosher food was also sent across the country to other Jewish centres. It was really a place for people to find out who they are and where they are going."

Mark Sapir says that what they are trying to do, is encourage people to contribute to the venture of rebuilding the synagogue. "I am hoping that eventually, the Jewish community worldwide will mobilize and give to this very worthy cause. Rabbi Lazar is coming to Canada to speak to people and gather support."

He says that building a new shul is a big project, "but there is a great need for such a place in Moscow and they cannot rebuild it by themselves. We need worldwide Jewish support and we know we can count on Torontonian Jews, because they have always been generous to Jewish causes. We hope that they will put their soul into this project." Polish Jewish council hopes to reclaim 1829 synagogue

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The local Jewish council in the Polish city of Wroclaw (formerly Breslau, the capital city of Silesia in East Germany) is trying to reclaim the old Storch Synagogue built in 1829, but has run into a roadblock.

The present owner of the shul, Jacek Lesiczka, a non-Jewish real estate speculator, is holding out for a sum which Gregory Szyjewicz, secretary of the Jewish community, says is "excessive" and cannot be raised by the local community

According to a story in the Polish Warsaw weekly Polityka, most of the Jews in Wroclaw were forced to leave for Israel in 1968 as the result of a government-directed anti-Jewish and anti-Zionist campaign. The small number of Jews left (about 100 families) could not afford to pay for the upkeep and maintenance of the synagogue and the building was taken over by the city.

The city leased it to the University of Wroclaw which, in turn, in 1970, subleased it to a musical academy. Extensive repairs and renovations were required. The academy could not pay the $50,000 in Polish currency and the renovator, Lesiczka, took over the building for a nominal price.

The Polityka story says a 1990 law requires the return of abandoned religious buildings to the municipality or the federal government. The Jews of Wroclaw claim the Storch synagogue should be covered under this law.

But Pavel Skrzywanek, the city's director of culture and sports, told the weekly that the law of recovery spells out the Catholic Church, and does not mention Jews specifically.

"This is a delicate and complicated matter and should be carefully considered," he said. "Hopefully in the next few months some compromise should be reached." He said Lesiczka has a valid title to the building.

Gregory Jazowski, an official at the Polish Embassy in Ottawa, told The CJN that a law respecting the recovery of relgious buildings is now before the Polish parliament but has not been passed. He said the Embassy had no information about the specific situation in Wroclaw.

Another element in the story is that recently the Lauder Foundation, a part of Investment House of New York, agreed to help restore the Storch Synagogue. The Polityka story commented: "The present Christian owner claims a valid and marketable title to this synagogue building and he feels entitled to make a profit, especially now that American benefactors are involved."

According to the weekly,the synagogue was not destroyed during Kristallnacht beause some influential Nazis owned nearby houses and feared the spread of fire.

Wroclaw's other synagogue, the biggest in the area, called Die Neus, and containing some priceless Jewish scripture and artifacts, was completely gutted during Kristallnacht.

In 1960, about 5,000 Jews lived in Wroclaw and a kosher store and a Talmudic elementary and high shool were in operation.

In 1933, its predecesssor, Breslau, had a thriving Jewish community of 20,000.

COCHIN, Kerala, India — The blue-patterned willow tiles on the floor of the 400-year-old Paradesi synagogue in Cochin are exotic, distinctive and fragile, very much like the tiny Jewish community the synagogue serves.

Visitors are asked to remove their shoes before entering the one remaining functioning Jewish house of worship on the fabled Malabar coast. The tiles, brought from Canton in 1760, will no doubt outlast the remnants of the Cochin Jewish community, who now number 22. There are no children.

* * *

The state of Kerala lies along the southwestern coast of India at the very tip of the subcontinent. Lush, green and watery, it is cut off from the rest of the country by the towering peaks of the Western Ghats. Long famous for its spice trade, Kerala has the highest literacy rate of all the Indian states (nearly 100 per cent), and a tradition of Marxist state governments.

It has also been the home of one of the smallest and most distinctive Jewish communities of the Diaspora — the Cochini. Never numbering more than 2,500 in total, divided internally into caste-like groups that mirrored Hindu society, their history in this isolated corner of India stretches back for at least a millennia — and if their legends are to be trusted, perhaps nearly 2,800 years. It is now coming to an end.

Our group of North American Jews had looked forward to meeting the patriarch of the community, octogenarian Satto Koder. Alas, he was recuperating from a serious illness. At first it appeared that no Cochini Jews would be able to meet with us — they were all at a shiva house. But finally, 77-year-old Jackie Cohen, the caretaker of the synagogue, appeared. "Ten years from now," he told us sadly, "there will be no more Jews in Cochin. This synagogue will be turned over to the Indian government as a museum."

Jackie Cohen

It is certainly worthy of museum status. A veritable jewel box, it sparkles in the light from hanging lamps of silver, brass and multi-colored glass. A gleaming brass bimah faces an ornately carved and gilded aron kodesh, which holds the treasure of the Cochin Jews: seven Torah scrolls in silver cases with golden crowns (one of which belonged to a local ruler, the Maharajah of Travancore, who in 1805 took it from his own head and placed it on the Torah) — and two copper plates, recording, in archaic Tamil, a grant from the local Hindu king to one Joseph Rabban and his descendants. Among the privileges awarded, including the right to collect certain taxes, were certain honors reserved for nobility: "the right to employ day lamp, decorative cloth, palanquin, umbrella, kettledrum, trumpet, gateway, arch, arched roof, weapons and the rest of the seventy-two privileges." The copper plates have been dated to 1000 C.E.

* * *

Although these plates establish the existence of a Jewish community in Cochin more than a millenium ago, its origins, like those of the Bene Israel, are lost in legend. The arrival of the Cochinis has been dated from the time of the First Temple to the destruction of the Second, and their original homes identified variously with communities all over Western Asia and the Mediterranean.

A further complication is the distinction between the Malabari (Black) and Paradesi (White) Jews of Cochin; the much more numerous Malabari Jews were regarded by the Paradesi as descendants of local converts and/or slaves; the Malabari in turn regarded the "White" Jews as usurping Johnny-come-latelys (Paradesi means "foreigner" in the local Malayalam language).

Much of the history of the Cochin Jews is a history of the caste-like distinctions and disputes between the two groups and sub-groups, like the "Brown" Jews, which developed over the centuries.

But in spite of their ritual separation — they did not intermarry, worship in each other's synagogues, or eat meat slaughtered by each other's schochtim — they were equally fervent in religious observance. Unlike the Bene Israel, the Jews of Cochin were always part of the wider Jewish world. They knew of the codification of the Oral Law; they wrote to each other and other Jews in Hebrew; they used a standard form of prayer according to Sephardic ritual. It was they who brought rabbinic Judaism to the Bene Israel.

Their heyday came during Dutch rule (1665-1795). The Dutch were far more tolerant of non-Christians than their predecessors, the Portuguese, and used the Cochin Jews as traders, agents and interpreters, and as go-betweens with the local rajahs. The Cochin Jews, to their delight, were able to establish contact with the powerful Dutch Jewish community.

With the coming of the British raj, the community retrenched. The area, isolated from the rest of India by mountains and jungle, became an agricultural and fishing backwater, with no major centres of commerce, ruled in sleepy splendour by the rajahs of Cochin; for trade, the British relied on their own and spurned the Jewish middlemen. After four centuries of prosperity, the Cochini Jews retreated into a genteel stagnation.

What woke them was the confluence of two events: the achievement of Indian independence in 1947; and the establishment of the State of Israel in 1948.

Indian independence stripped the maharajahs, including the Rajah of Cochin, of their princely powers — and the tiny community of Cochin Jews found themselves stripped of their guaranteed seat on the rajah's legislative council.

They had no experience of discrimination from the surrounding Indian population, and they regarded Cochin as their home. But for centuries they had been praying for a return to Zion, and when they learned that Israel was welcoming immigrants from all over the Diaspora, the Malabari Jews decided that this was where they, as Jews, belonged. By 1955 most of them had emigrated. Some Paradesi Jews also emigrated, but since they were more likely to have property in India, the majority stayed — for a while.

Twenty-five years ago, in 1968, the Paradesi synagogue celebrated the 400th anniversary of its founding. It was a great event, attended by Prime Minister Indira Ghandi, who paid tribute to both Jewish contributions to India and to Indian tolerance to minorities like Jews.

This celebration was the last great event in the history of Cochin's Jews. The Malabari Jews were already gone; immediately after the anniversary, in the 1970s, nearly all their Paradesi counterparts also left for Israel.

* * *

As we wandered through Cochin's Jewtown (the official name of the neighborhood), we came across Jackie Cohen's home.

"Jacob Cohen, accountant," the neat plaque said. The entrance was faced with an ironwork grille, painted white, red and blue: white bars, red hearts and blue Stars of David. Jackie Cohen was the only Cochin Jew we met in all of Jewtown.

The narrow street leading to the Paradesi synagogue was silent, the odor of cloves and cardamom heavy in the air.

Then, behind us, came voices. A busload of tourists, heading towards the synagogue, speaking Hebrew.

The News in Brief

B.C. Anti-Racism Grants

VANCOUVER — The Canadian Anti-Racism and Education and Research Society has been awarded two British Columbia grants totalling nearly $28,000, to produce anti-racism material. The announcement was made by Consumer Services minister Joan Smallwood on behalf of Multiculturalism and Human Rights Minister, Moe Sihota. A grant of $20,000 will fund production of a handbook that will enable community groups and victims of racism to respond effectively to incidents of racism and organized hate group activities, she said. Another grant of almost $8,000 will enable the society to produce translations of its pamphlet, How to Deal with Racial Violence, into six languages including French and Chinese. The Canadian Anti-Racism and Education and Research Society is affiliated with the British Columbia Organization to Fight Racism, to which Canadian Jewish Congress, Pacific region belongs.

Liberty Net in Hot Water Again

VANCOUVER — It's strike two against the Canadian Liberty Net, the local phone service the Canadian Human Rights Commission says transmits hate messages. A human rights tribunal has found that Tony McAleer and his Liberty Net violated the Human Rights Act with its recorded messages against gays. In 1992, another tribunal ordered the service to stop playing taped messages from neo-Nazi groups around the world. McAleer was found in contempt of court during those hearings for violating an interim order to cease and desist the Nazi messages. Both the order and the Federal Court contempt finding are under appeal. The tribunal ordered McAleer, Canadian Liberty Net and associates "anywhere in Canada" to stop distributing phone messages that expose persons to hatred or contempt on the basis of phohibited grounds including sexual orientation. This case will likely also be appealed.

Clinton Goes to Bat for Survivor

WASHINGTON — U.S. President Bill Clinton last week joined the fight for Hugo Princz, a Holocaust survivor denied war reparations by the German government because of his American citizenship. Clinton raised the matter in his private White House meeting with German Chancellor Helmut Kohl last Monday. Neither the White House nor the German Embassy were willing to comment on the meeting. The German government has denied Princz war reparations for over 40 years because, as an American citizen when liberated from Nazi concentration camps, he did not meet the requirement that recipients be "stateless." Princz, 70, spent three years at the Auschwitz and Dachau concentration camps.

Gore Slams Anti-Semitism

NEW YORK — U.S. Vice-President Al Gore spoke out passionately against anti-Semitism last week, taking strong issue with a recent speech by an aide to Louis Farrakhan. "Anti-Semitism has stained our history," Gore said at a tribute dinner here sponsored by the UJA-Federation of New York. "How can we relax when Louis Farrakhan's lieutenants blame Jews for the Holocaust?" The vice-president was referring to a anti-Jewish speech given at Kean College in New Jersey last November by Khalid Abdul Mohammad, a senior official of Farrakhan's Nation of Islam. Gore called on Farrakhan to denounce the speech. "America is a tolerant country, but we should not tolerate hatred and racism," he said.

New Evidence in War Crimes Case

WASHINGTON — The Justice Department has presented new evidence of a Philadelphia-area man's alleged World War II atrocities against Jews in a new effort to withdraw his U.S. citizenship. Jonas Stelmokas, a prominent member of Philadelphia's Lithuanian-American community, has lived in the U.S. since 1949. Justice Department documents filed last week in U.S. District Court in Philadelphia charged that the 77-year-old Stelmokas, a retired architect, was a platoon commander of a Lithuanian police battalion involved in a so-called "cleansing" operation of the Jewish ghetto in Kaunas (Kovno) on Oct. 29, 1941. The documents say that 9,200 Jews, almost half of them children, died in mass executions that took place that day.

Israeli Intifada Deaths Up

JERUSALEM — The number of Israelis killed in the intifada last year rose by more than 50 percent over 1992, despite an overall drop in terror attacks, according to figures released by police last week. Police Inspector-General Rafi Peled warned of the potential for an increase in attacks by Palestinian terrorists opposed to the peace process. Forty-three civilians and 22 security personnel were killed in intifada-related attacks in 1993, compared to 24 civilians and 15 security personnel the previous year. The figures showed a drop in attacks, including stonings and firebombings, of about 16 percent within the Green Line and 9 percent in the territories. The number of shootings, widely thought to have risen, actually dropped by more than 30 percent. Sharp rises, however, were recorded in grenade attacks and bombings. Meanwhile, police also reported a rise in files opened against Jewish residents of the territories, but did not have exact figures because in the past, this statistic was not recorded.

Rabin Reassures Hadassah

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin last week told 200 members of the board of Hadassah that their work was needed and appreciated. He urged them to ignore recent remarks by other Israeli officials that appeared to denigrate its value to Israeli society. "Don't listen to some people here and there who don't understand the importance of Hadassah in Israel" and of the relationship "between Jewish communities all over the world and Israel," he said in an address. Rabin was referring to remarks made in recent weeks by Deputy Foreign Minister Yossi Beilin, who called on Diaspora Jewry to focus more on the crisis in Jewish continuity back home and less on an increasingly wealthy Israel.

Kahane Chai Members Arrested

JERUSALEM — Eleven right-wing activists from the Kahane Chai group were arrested last week for trying to occupy homes in an Arab village close to the Jewish settlement of Kfar Tappuah. The arrests took place after the members of Kahane Chai attempted to use the Arab homes as the basis of a settlement of their own. Kfar Tappuah, located east of Tel Aviv, was slated to be the next site for a new settlement to be built by the settlers group Zu Artzeinu, or This Is Our Land. The group has been engaged in a campaign to establish 130 new settlements throughout the territories — effectively doubling the current number of settlements — to protest the Israeli-PLO self-rule accord.

Tsomet Members Split

JERUSALEM — The Rabin government's shaky coalition may stand a little firmer, following a split within Israel's second-largest opposition party, Tsomet. Three of Tsomet's eight Knesset members announced last week the creation of a new party, Ya'ad. The three denied they were negotiating a possible entry into the Labor-led coalition, but they did not rule out that option in the future. The split follows weeks of acrimonious dispute between Tsomet's popular leader, Rafael Eitan, and the three Knesset members, who have have been demanding that an outside investigator look into alleged mismanagement of Tsomet's funds and that the party's secretary-general, Doron Shmueli, step down pending the results of the investigation. But Eitan has repeatedly turned down their demands.

Neo-Fascists Make Nice

ROME — Italy's neo-fascists have formally voted to soften some of their traditional far-right positions in an attempt to ditch their jackboot image and win support in crucial general elections two months away. Delegates to a national convention last weekend of the neo-fascist Italian Social Movement, known by the initials MSI, backed party leader Gianfranco Fini's call to merge with other conservative-right groups into a bloc called the National Alliance Movement. The NAM already has the support of some marginal conservative groups such as shopkeepers and monarchists, but it is seeking to ally itself with other rightists before the country's general elections, scheduled for March 27-28.

PLO Office Gets Boost

AMSTERDAM — The Netherlands has granted semi-diplomatic status to the PLO office in The Hague, in recognition of the group's efforts toward peace. The PLO office in the Dutch city previously served solely as an information office without having any official status. As a result of its change of status, the office will now be able to fly the Palestinian flag outside the building in which it is housed.

By RABBI LOUIS I. SCHECHTER

Since Purim's inception, we Jews have always celebrated it by gathering in our synagogues and listening to the reading of the megillah, the dramatic story of how, once again, God saved Israel from destruction.

Purim has been the holiday which, more than any other, has symbolized for us the miracle of Jewish survival, the indestructability of the Jewish people. It has been the holiday which demonstrated that God's promise to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob holds true, that Jewry will never be destroyed

Yet in the whole megillah, God is not mentioned once. You can peruse the megillah from one end to the other end and you will not find even an allusion to God or His providence. Why? Surely God should be referred to at least once. Isn't that, after all, our purpose in celebrating Purim — to recognize that God guides the world and that He will never permit the Jewish people to be destroyed. It, indeed, seems peculiar that in a scroll which celebrates God's deliverance, God is not mentioned.

Perhaps, though, this is not as strange as it seems at first. How did the deliverance of Purim take place? No cataclysmic events occurred. Just a series of seemingly unrelated trivial incidents took place, all of which seemed quite natural. Esther, because of her beauty was chosen queen. Mordecai, because of his alertness, loyalty and firm moral principles saved the king from assassination. Esther, because of her great moral courage, was willing to risk her life to save her people. The king, because he couldn't sleep, recognized his debt to Mordecai. Mordecai, because of his knowledge, was able to draw up a decree which would, without annulling, cancel out the results of Haman's decree.

But if one looks closely at all these acts, one can see the interweaving of the divine and human. God surely intervened in this story by seeing to it that Esther was beautiful and that the king could not sleep. But this alone would not have been enough. If Esther had not had the moral courage to go to the king, if Mordecai had not saved the king's life,and if he had not advised Esther the way he did, the Jews would not have been saved. True, God would have found another way to have saved the Jews. But who knows if it would have been with so little suffering.

This is the reason, I believe, God is not mentioned in the megillah. Not that God isn't the author of this deliverance, but it teaches us that we are all potential helpers in our own deliverance, if we only will lead lives of moral dedication. If we are true to our Jewish principles, God will use our dedication to these principles as the means of ensuring our survival. In other words, if we dedicate ourselves to Jewish principles, Jewish survival will take care of itself.

Coping with the pain of death

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — We all like to think that, faced with the death of someone we love dearly, we would cope adequately.

We like to think that we will be "adult" about the whole thing. We will accept the inevitable, will cry just a little (and mostly in private) and, after the shiva, return to our day to day lives as if little had changed.

We also, of course, believe that we will come out of the whole experience somehow enriched in a spiritual sense.

Then the unthinkable happens: you lose a parent, or a spouse, or a sibling, or, perhaps worst of all, a child. And all your preconceptions fly out the window.

You find yourself railing at G-d for permitting such an injustice. You see the person who died walking down the street, or in the grocery aisle of the supermarket, or coming out of shul, or driving down Bathurst Street.

Something interesting happens, and your first reaction is to pick up the phone to call — only to remember that there is no one to call. Or you need to know how cousin Ruth is really related to you, or when the family came from Poland, or how to make stuffing on Pesach.

Most of all, you can't believe how long the pain lasts — how, long after the world expects you to have returned to normal, you see the person's handwriting on an old photograph and you feel as if a piece is being ripped out of your heart.

Judaism is a wise religion. It recognizes that mourning is a genuine and necessary emotion, and guides you along its path.

Before the funeral, a mourner is not obligated to pray, as the tradition recognizes that when grief is that raw, it cannot be put aside even for that.

During shiva, one may not go outside, have normal marital relations, wear makeup or shave. Others prepare and serve meals, and come to offer comfort and support.

After the seven days, one gradually returns to normal activities of life. For a month after the death, or a year in the case of a parent, the mourner does not go to social events, listen to public music performances, or buy new clothes unless absolutely necessary.

These rules allow you to gradually move from the most intense, inner-directed mourning to facing the world in your new life.

Probably the best-known, and widest used book on the Jewish laws and customs of mourning is Maurice Lamm's The Jewish Way in Death and Mourning (Jonathan David, 1969). It is unbeatable as a clear, concise guide at this time.

But Anne Brener offers a different approach in her Mourning & Mitzvah; A guided journal for walking the mourner's path through grief to healing (Jewish Lights, 1993). She suggests that a mourner keep a journal, reflecting his or her feelings during the mourning period.

Carefully planned exercises help guide the user of this book to a better understanding of their feelings, and helps them cope with the changes they face.

The chapters follow the cycle of mourning. For instance, Brener suggests you consciously think about the eulogy that was given at the funeral, and add (or subtract) what might have been said. One exercise has you write a letter to the deceased, talking about your memories, how their death has affected you, what you treasure most about them.

She even suggests writing about the negative feelings you have about the person, and, by confronting them, purging yourself of the bitterness that is left.

Finally, assignments have you pretend to immerse yourself in a pool of flowing water, a process which, at different times in the grief cycle help dispell sadness, or help the return to normal life.

Between specific exercises, Brener, a psychotherapist who teaches and lectures on the subject of grief and healing, discusses the psychology of grief generally and the Jewish philosophical approaches to the subject.

In the end, no matter how supporting and kind our family, friends and community may be, each of us finds that we must face our sorrow alone. In the pages of Mourning & Mitzvah, we find the path not quite as lonely.

Lessons of past errors pave road to brighter future

By YESHAYAHU ANUG

Israelis and Arabs, whose destinies will be affected by the outcome of the languishing peace talks, are confused by what they hear from their leaders. Although their political environments could not be more different — Jews live in a restless democracy and Arabs under authoritarian regimes — their respective popular perceptions of the past and illusions about the future are both still basically unreconciled. Information about the state of the peace talks is scarce, and there is a growing feeling that the notorious handshake in Washington has exhausted its psychological potential and may soon be a fading memory.

This is where things are believed to stand now, but not where they will remain. The handshake — never mind how sincere or firm — was a defiance of fatalism and has shaken the status quo. A process has started; the clock is ticking, it is bound to move forward, and when it stops sometime in 1994, the region will either wake up to the dawn of a more peaceful future or start the countdown to another explosion.

At this point, facing reality is more important than perpetuating illusions even if they are politically helpful. On both sides the leaders know the facts of life but face public opinions which they themselves had conditioned to expect full triumph over the other side. They must now lower expectations without losing face or ground. And this is where they are stumbling.

To this day, the idea of ultimately accepting Israel has not sufficiently penetrated the consciousness of the Arab masses. The recovery of all of Palestine has for decades been the galvanizing theme in the divided Arab camp and has been kept alive at the very cost of Palestinian homelessnes. After protracted warfare and only in the wake of a less disastrous military campaign in 1973, Egypt's Anwar al-Sadat took the first step towards conciliation and separated his country's destiny from that of its Arab allies, who in turn ostracized him. His intentions however, were misintepreted by Menachem Begin, who, at the time, genuinely believed that the return of Sinai to Egypt would leave the other territories unchallenged in Israeli hands. This concept led to the breakdown of the "autonomy talks" and Moshe Dayan's retirement in 1979, then to Ariel Sharon's campaign in Lebanon, and finally to Begin's demise from politics.

Yeshayahu Anug

Chased from Lebanon, the PLO leadership recovered precariously in distant Tunis. When the intifada exploded spontaneously five years later, the PLO, which had lost some of its clout in the territories, adopted the upheaval, but had to witness the sudden rise of the fundamentalist Hamas, whom the Israeli administration initially encouraged as a useful counterbalance to the PLO. It took time and many more casualties on both sides, before Israel reached the unconfessed conclusion that the intifada had done for Palestinian self-respect what the Yom Kippur War had done for Egypt's pride. On occasion, such situations ultimately produce change, but Israel drew no operative conclusions. A serious attempt to isolate Yasser Arafat was made by Prime Minister Shimon Peres and King Hussein of Jordan in London (1987), but the resulting agreement was rejected by Yitzhak Shamir, Peres' coalition-partner. A year later when Arafat was induced (by the Swedish foreign minister) to put out some peace feelers and did so, albeit very ambiguously, he was ignored by Shamir, then prime minister.

While the intifada and Israeli repression continued to add more casualties to the long list, Arafat made the biggest mistake of his career when he embraced Saddam Hussein's cause. He was severely punished by Iraq's Arab enemies and practically ignored by others. His decline would have continued, but for the rise of Islamic fundamentalism everywhere, which made his movement look better and appear to be a likely instrument for a peaceful resolution of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. This was the concept that inspired the Madrid Peace Conference staged by the Bush administration, where the PLO, still not recognized by the United States and Israel, was however given a semi-official back-stage role. But practically nothing happened after the elaborate Madrid ceremony. In a moment of candor (later denied) Shamir confessed that he had no real intention of letting it succeed. Syria behaved aggressively throughout the talks and James Baker tried to rescue the initiative by shuttling unsuccessfully between Mideastern capitals. Finally Shamir and Bush lost their mandates, giving way to Yitzak Rabin and Bill Clinton.

The new administration in Washington needed some time to settle in. In Israel, Rabin, who was elected on a peace platform, explored his chances with Syria, but recoiled when the price tag appeared too high politically, and switched to the Palestinian sector. A year later came the bombshell of the Oslo agreement. A series of encounters with the now recognized PLO showed how unprepared that organization still was for sensible bargaining. And finally, Clinton met Hafez al-Assad in Geneva and attention turned again to the sensitive Golan issue. Syria is now believed to be holding the master key that could unlock the whole blocked Mideastern peace imbroglio. But the price is still high.

While all this is on Rabin's plate — supporters and opponents of the peace process in Israel, with the exception of fanatics of various persuasions, know very well that the price of accommodation is high, worth paying for some, intolerable for almost as many others, but fixed. It means, in fact, the gradual abandonment of nearly all the occupied territories, the eventual loss, though in stages, of most settlements, and also an imaginative solution for East Jerusalem — all sacrosanct taboos. The present government seems basically ready to embark upon this difficult itinerary, provided maximum security can be guaranteed and properly safeguarded, but it is severely handicapped by the uncertain evaluation of public and parliamentary support. The announcement of a possible referendum to be held over the Golan issue was intended to win some respite in the confrontation with the powerful pro-Golan lobby, while in the meantime, more efforts could be made to clarify the prospects of progress in the Israeli-Palestinian negotiations.

Media reports on the ups and downs of the peace process are rarely reliable. More that is not revealed is going on behind the scenes. But success or failure depends entirely on whether or not the lessons of missed opportunities and misperceptions throughout the long history of the conflict have been absorbed by the parties.

Uproar rocks a tiny Jewish community in Germany

By MIRIAM WIDMAN

The president of the tiny Jewish community in the eastern German city of Magdeburg has reportedly resigned after charges were made that he and most or all of the community's board members are not in fact Jewish.

Accusations were also made that the Jewish community head, Ulrich Levy, had used the community's offices as a headquarters for a nationalist political party.

Levy, in fact, acknowledged that he is a member of the East German Unity party. But he denied charges that he was using the Jewish community offices as a party bureau.

The uproar reflects what happened to the decimated Jewish communities in formerly Communist Eastern Europe and the legacy from those times that still intrudes today.

The fact that this controversy has arisen in Magdeburg is ironic, since its 100-member Jewish community, which dates to at least 965 CE, is the oldest in eastern Germany and one of the oldest in the entire country.

Levy has denied charges he himself is not halachically Jewish, and produced a rabbi's claim to support his word.

But in face of this onslaught of accusations, Levy reportedly resigned from the board and would not speak to reporters.

The strange story came to light after Levy asked board member Peter Ledermann for personal information on the other board members, for reasons that are not clear.

Ledermann refused the request, saying personal files must remain personal under German law.

He then said the information in the files provides evidence that the board members, including Levy, are not Jews and said he feared the information would be manipulated or destroyed.

Ledermann was expelled from the board at the end of December but has now been reinstated.

Recently, in a three-hour interview with the Jewish Telegraphic Agency, Levy acknowledged that he and three other board members kicked Ledermann off the board for not complying with the request for the files.

As the fur flew between the two men, Ledermann also provided information that Levy had spent four years in prison for a criminal offense about 20 years ago.

Levy admitted he spent time in prison but said it was only two years and declined to say for what crime he was incarcerated.

The incident is an embarrassment for Germany's small Jewish community.

Ledermann and his wife, Claudia Oppenheimer, initiated the claims that Levy and other board members are not Jewish.

As proof, they said Levy's mother was not listed among the Jews of Magdeburg in a list compiled in 1946.

Jews in Europe register as official members with the Jewish communities. There are, however, Jews who have refrained from doing so because it reminds them of how the Nazis used Jewish community lists to find and deport Jews to their deaths.

They claimed that during the Communist regime of the former German Democratic Republic, Levy's father, then a board member, knowingly allowed non-Jews to become members, not only of Magdeburg's Jewish community but also of its board of directors.

While such a practice might seem odd in the West, it makes more sense when one takes into consideration the situation for Jews here following World War II.

In decimated post-Holocaust Eastern European Jewish communities, particularly where the Communists ruled and religion was almost obliterated, intermarriage was a regular occurrence and harassment or fear kept people from publicly identifying as Jews. And with no rabbis, conversion by those who would have chosen it was unavailable.

Levy strongly maintains that he is Jewish, and a rabbi he asked to rule on his case agreed.

Levy, who conducted the interview with JTA with two open-faced ham sandwiches sitting on his desk, admitted that at least one board member has neither a Jewish mother nor a Jewish father.

But he said that board member's mother, Eva Maria Roth, had been admitted into the Jewish community of the former German Democratic Republic, which numbered only 26 people.

The board member, Patricia Werner, has not been removed, but she will not take part in active meetings until a rabbi can rule on her case. (JTA)

Conference offers blueprint for Syrian/Israeli peace

By SAM SKOLNIK

The meeting last month between President Bill Clinton and Syrian President Hafez al-Assad may do much to clear the logjam in Israel-Syria negotiations. But it is probable that the basis for peace between the two long-time bitter enemies already has been formulated in secret meetings.

In Oslo, of all places.

The meetings were sponsored by a group called the Initiative for Peace and Co-operation in the Middle East, the project of a small American organization named Search for a Common Ground, hitherto virtually unknown.

The meetings started last May in Switzerland and Germany, and finally reached the Norwegian capital, where in October the participants signed a text, referred to as a "working paper," which detailed steps Israel and Syria could take to move toward peaceful relations.

According to reports, the group consisted of over 30 academics, former government officials and other private citizens from Israel, Syria, Egypt, Iraq, Jordan, Kuwait, Lebanon, Saudi Arabia and Turkey. Palestinians were also included.

Participants have confirmed the substance of a "text" of the plan, which was published late last year by Al-Muharrir, a Paris-based Arabic newspaper. The highlights include:

- Israel's recognition of Syrian sovereignty over the Golan Heights, back to the pre-1967 border.
- Syrian recognition of "Israel's right to exist in security."
- Syria's promise to maintain a "complete peace" with Israel.
- Security arrangements to be supervised by an international body or a multinational authority.
- The removal of Israeli settlements from the area, to coincide with Israel's withdrawal.
- Water resources on the Golan Heights "shall be dealt with in accordance with ... legitimate international norms."

Yossi Olmert, one of the Israeli participants, said that the "Oslo paper gave a spelling out of an agreement" that the Israeli public could buy. It is based on the "Egyptian-Israeli model," Olmert said in a telephone interview from Israel.

Olmert, who headed the government press office under the former prime minister, Yitzhak Shamir, said that Assad, whether he likes it or not, will have to clarify his definition of peace.

Two Syrians attended the meetings, including an academic named Aziz Shukri, according to Olmert, and attached their seal of approval to the Oslo document. Olmert suggested that the Syrian government must have known about the meetings.

Participants, as well as the sponsoring organizations, insisted that there was no governmental sanction of the meetings.

Olmert said that he had no instructions from anyone in the Israeli government before attending, but that immediately afterward he notified a "high official" in the office of Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin.

A press release from the Initiative for Peace and Co-operation in the Middle East stated that the "discussions have not been officially sanctioned by either government, and in no way constitute negotiations between Israel and Syria."

One bone of contention left unresolved, said Olmert, was the duration of any Israeli withdrawal. The Syrians pressed to have the withdrawal completed within two years; the Israelis wanted a six-to-eight year period.

When asked if this agreement could be compared to the previous secret accord to come from Oslo — the one with the signatures of Israeli Foreign Minister Shimon Peres and PLO representative Mohammed Abbas (Abu Mazin) on it — Olmert replied in the negative.

Olmert said he had "nothing to do with Shimon Peres' boys," referring to Peres' assistants in the Israeli Foreign Ministry who were instrumental in the development of the September 1993 agreement. The Washington Jewish Week

Yeltsin's move

Since the collapse of communism in the former Soviet Union, visible anti-Semitism has been on the upswing, particularly in Russia. In the past year alone, a number of cemeteries have been desecrated, Moscow's venerable Chorale Synagogue has been vandalized three times, and verbal and physical attacks on Jewish individuals in the streets have increased.

These incidents, a symptom of the rise of rabid nationalism in the old Soviet Union's largest and most populous republic, are a source of concern to Russia's substantial Jewish community. In the last 50 or so years of communism, state anti-Semitism was the norm, but at least violent manifestations of hatemongering were discouraged and suppressed.

With the flowering of democracy in Russia, the forces of anti-Semitism have come out into the open to ply their noxious wares. They can, after all, disingenously claim that the emerging democratic system entitles them to freedom of speech. One such right-wing demagogue, Vladimir Zhirinovsky, has already taken full advantage of the situation. Zhirinovsky's astonishing success in recent parliamentary elections is largely a function of the economic and political chaos that grips Russia today. But Zhirinovsky is not merely expressing discontent with Russia's formidable problems. He is giving voice to the kind of ethnocentrism and intolerance that have been Russia's bane for centuries. In short, he is perpetuating age-old hatreds in the name of Russian nationalism.

In the face of all this, Russian President Boris Yeltsin has, regrettably and strangely, maintained a deafening silence. The dangers of his position, or lack thereof, are quite obvious. "In the absence of a clear message from the authorities, average people have started to accept anti-Semitism as a tolerable point of view," Micha Chelnov, president of the Moscow-based Confederation of Jewish Organizations and Communities (Vaad), has warned.

It is incumbent on Yeltsin to speak out forcefully. Anti-Semitism is not a passing phenomenon which can be blithely ignored or shunted aside. It is a poisonous and destabilizing force which can imperil his relatively reform-minded government.

A shameful episode

The White House in Washington is now looking into accounts of medical experiments done in the wake of World War II using nuclear radiation. The purpose of the tests was to ascertain the results of exposing human beings to radiation; some of the experiments in question are even said to have involved pregnant women.

Meg Greenfield, writing in Newsweek (Jan. 17, 1994), indicated that some of the people who were tested were informed in advance of the nature of the tests in question and gave their consent. Others were totally unaware of what was being done to them. "Related disclosures," Greenfield adds, "concern the federal government's failure to be truthful about the terribly harmful effects of some of its nuclear enterprises . . ."

Greenfield surely has a gift for understatement. Less than a decade after the Nazis had exposed POWs, Jews and other inmates of the concentration camps to heinous medical experiments, American doctors and researchers were using human beings as guinea pigs to ascertain their upper toleration limits for nuclear radiation.

It has been argued in mitigation of the American researchers' culpability that in the late 1940s and early 1950s they were unaware of the dangers of radiation and that during that period Cold War politics dictated the need for an aggressive research enterprise. This retrospective justification frees everyone from complicit involvement in one of the most shameful episodes of post-World War II American history.

It is true that there is a difference between experiments performed by SS doctors in the concentration camps and U.S. army researchers after the war. But the difference is one of degree — not principle. The German physicians who were involved in medical experiments could and did argue that their experiments were designed to learn how to save lives of German soldiers. Others justified their participation on the ground that the war effort gave them an imprimatur for their experiments. Robert Jay Lifton in his book Nazi Doctors describes how physicians were able to rationalize a series of what was undoubtedly the most diabolical medical exercises in history.

The recent disclosures regarding American medical experiments with human beings in the post-World War II period show that retroactive justification and rationalization were not the exclusive prerogatives of the Nazis.

'DOESN'T LOOK KOSHER TO ME

Two residents of Jerusalem's ultra-Orthodox neighborhood Mea Shearim inspect one of the new posters that have been plastered on their walls by the Jerusalem Rabbinate. The poster warns of the dangers of not properly washing salad vegetables and shows a portion of the types of bugs that may remain on food. The notice points out of course, that such animals are not kosher. [IPPA photo]

Letters to the Editor

Letters are welcome if they are brief, in English or French, typewritten with lines double spaced, and of interest to our reading public. AGHAST AT USE OF LEOPARD

It was painful to open The Canadian Jewish News this morning (Jan. 6) and see the picture on page 26 (Montreal edition) of the Acoca brothers posing with their chained leopard, which they use as a form of entertainment at cocktail parties.

If wild animals must be removed from their natural habitat, which in itself is questionable, at least they should be maintained in surroundings which closely resemble those of their natural environment. To a certain extent the use of animals held in captivity can be justified for educational purposes but certainly not for entertainment at cocktail parties and the like.

Unfortunately for the leopard and for anyone who cares how animals are treated, there is probably very little one can do to force the Acoca brothers to return the leopard to her natural habitat. However, The Canadian Jewish News is encouraging this appalling misuse of animals by promoting the Acoca brothers and their Jordan Bar Service.

QUESTIONS FOR SHARON

In addressing an enthusiastic crowd of Toronto supporters recently, Ariel Sharon, former Israeli defence minister, called for increased Jewish settlements in the West Bank, and repudiation of the current accord between Israel and the PLO.

There was an assumption expressed that evening that a majority of Toronto Jews support Sharon and the settlers' rejection of the accord — which is not true. This assumption was allowed to go unchallenged that particular evening because there was no question period following Sharon's address.

I was there only to observe, not support, as were others. If allowed to speak, I would have asked Sharon and his followers to answer the following questions:

(1) Will there be more — or less — terrorism against the settlers if they continue to expand their presence in the territories, and if Israel rejects the accord?

(2) What are the consequences of Israel disavowing the accord? Would Israel then be able to negotiate peace agreements with Syria, Jordan and Lebanon? If these countries refuse, are the risks of another major conflict, particularly with Syria, increased — or decreased? Would the next war, given the new military technologies, and the advanced state of Arab military might, particularly Syrian, be more or less catastrophic? Can Israel fight another war effectively with hostile Palestinians within its annexed borders?

(3) If Israel repudiates the accord, how would this affect its strategic relationship with the United States and the supply of valuable U.S. military aid and technology? Would President Bill Clinton and Congress look upon Israel as a strategic threat — or strategic advantage — for American interests in the Middle East?

(4) How would probable international condemnation and isolation affect Israel politically and economically? Can Israel, a small country, survive sanctions?

AN ALARMING RECORD

I looked in vain in the last CJN for any editorial comment regarding Ariel Sharon's recent Toronto visit in which he openly demanded that Diaspora Jewry come to the aid of Israel's militant settlers and repudiate the peace process led by the Rabin government.

Are we to believe by the silence of our mainstream leaders and the people they represent that they all, or most, agree with Sharon and his promotion of the cause of Greater Israel?

Someone should recall that it was Sharon, who, as minister of defence, was the architect of Israel's prolonged and disastrous involvement in Lebanon from 1982 to 1985 — a war in which more than 660 Israeli soldiers died, over 2,500 were wounded, and not one military or political goal of Sharon's was ultimately achieved.

The PLO and Palestinian nationalism, while temporarily stalled, eventually revitalized. Lebanon was shattered. Syria's presence in Lebanon became more firmly ensconced than ever. Most importantly, security for the Israeli settlements in the Galilee — the legitimate reason for the first stage of the Lebanon incursion — is as far away as it ever was.

A WORRISOME SCENARIO

Rabbi Dow Marmur argues for an optimistic view of the Israeli-PLO agreement, while David Dewitt speaks of events that "hopefully, have forever changed the nature of diplomacy in the Middle East." (Viewpoints, The CJN, Dec. 23, 1993).

The notion that under the PLO-Israeli agreement, Israel, to wit, can transfer the character of the Middle East, partakes of the phantasmagoric. What we can confidently surmise regarding the Middle East, following the establishment of a Palestinian State is this:

1. The eventual political nature of that state is unclear, for obvious reasons, chief among them being the fact that except for the Jewish State, democracy is basically alien to the entire region.

2. Tiny Israel, in returning to its pre-'67 borders, and allowing a Palestinian nation of several million people to be established on the West Bank and Gaza, will relinquish all future claim to the land, and even the possibility of capturing it in any future war.

3. Much of the Middle East political structure will go unchanged. Probably all of the leaders in the region, many known to stir anxiety in us, will remain in place.

4. Regional instabilities and conflicts will remain. For example, will the Israeli-PLO agreement, and the establishment of a tiny Palestinian State, defuse the tension between Iran-Iraq, between Egypt-Libya, lessen Saddam Hussein's appetite for his neighbors land, and resolve the plight of the "real Palestinians," the 20 million Muslim Kurds struggling for a separate homeland?

5. Islamic fundamentalism will remain a major, if not growing force in the area, even as it grows worldwide. It has the power to overthrow governments, and from what we know of it, will continue to see Israel as an alien presence in the area that should be removed. To the extent that secular Israel seeks to argue for secular democracy in the region, it will further exacerbate the ire of the fundamentalists.

6. Military buildup in the region will go unabated. Israeli youth, sadly, will continue to serve precious years in the army, and the country, having to maintain and update its military readiness, will by token of this fact, not enjoy the benefits of a relaxed military posture.

The Church and the Jews

By RABBI W. GUNTHER PLAUT

The rapprochement between the Vatican and Israel made headlines around the world. Quite properly, the media treated it as more than an ordinary mutual recognition of two autonomous states. They emphasized the almost 2,000-year-long tension between Jews and Christians in general and the Roman Catholic Church in particular. In this column I need hardly recount the persecutions we suffered at the hands of a powerful religious institution that somehow could not come to terms with our continued existence.

It has long been my opinion that the Vatican's hesitation to recognize the state of Israel was based only in part on its political interests in Arab countries, and its oft enunciated concern that Israel might not protect Christian properties with due respect. All that was obviously nothing more than a pretense. The real reason was theological, and that is why the turning point in this dismal relationship (if one can use the word at all) was Vatican Council II in 1965, which tackled the theological problem of the continued existence of the Jewish people.

It presaged a new era. For the first time, the Vatican acknowledged that Jews still play an important role in God's economy. The Council's statement did not say everything we would have liked it to say, but it was a huge step forward. The recent mutual recognition of the Vatican and the state of Israel is a direct result of a decades-old development.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut

What was at stake was not so much the recognition of the state of Israel itself but rather what Israel represented: the indubitable fact that the Jewish people was alive and had a living future. For nearly 2,000 years the church had struggled with that very idea. In its theology, Jews should have given up the ghost with the coming of the Christian savior. Yet we continued to practice our religion and — in the church's view — chose to be blind. Therefore, our very presence in history was a subtle disclaimer of Christianity, and as the church strove for and achieved absolute power in its realm, it felt it could not allow this. Hence, it permitted and often prompted the persecution of the Jews, hoping for the extinction of their religious identity.

Vatican II gave up this millennia-old perception, or at least it made its abolishment possible. The church began to approach the Jewish community. Respectful and even cordial relations developed, and the diplomatic development of the last month was its climax.

There have been many indications that this was going to happen. In September, Pope John Paul II received Israel's Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi Israel Meyer Lau at Castel Gondolfo, the papal summer palace. It was the first encounter between a Pope and an Israeli Chief Rabbi since the nation's birth in 1948. After the meeting, the Vatican described it as having been "very warm" and "charged with special meaning at this delicate and important time for peace in the Holy Land."

A quarterly published in Jerusalem entitled Christians and Israel had the following comments:

"Chief Rabbi Lau expressed his appreciation of the forthright and thoughtful leadership given by Pope John Paul II in the process of charting 'a new Christian course' with respect to Judaism and Israel, repudiating centuries of anti-Semitism and persecution, and promoting a fundamentally changed outlook for the future.

"The Pope and the Chief Rabbi exchanged thoughts regarding the essential relevance to human progress of the ethical teachings of the prophets and sages of Israel, in a world afflicted by poverty, disease, hatred and violence. Particularly outrageous is murder purportedly in the name of the Creator, which all religions should surely condemn.

"Agreement was expressed, too, at the meeting that it would be well to explore, methodically and in depth, Jewish biblical tenets that can enhance harmony in the world, and to formulate and propagate these among Christians."

Indeed, the accord that was signed emphasized the obligation of the church not only to recognize anti-Semitism as a danger but to fight it actively. It is a statement that describes the vast change that has taken place.

All of this was hastened by the negotiations between the Palestinians and the Israelis. Which shows that not only hatred and animosity but also peace and goodwill can be contagious.

Who will reap the economic benefits of peace?

By LARRY YUDELSON

As nations and agencies commit themselves to aiding Palestinian development, the most prosaic of questions has become political: where will the money actually go? Will Jordanian or Israeli banks reap the benefits of billions of dollars in deposits?

Most recently, Farouk Kaddoumi, head of the Palestine Liberation Organization's political department, flew to Amman to sign an agreement on economic co-operation with Jordan.

The agreement had been drafted last fall but was approved by the PLO only after repeated public pressure from King Hussein.

The deal grants Jordanian banks permission to operate in the West Bank once Palestinian autonomy begins, and it reportedly sets the Jordanian dinar as the official currency in these areas.

But notwithstanding the agreement with Jordan, some senior Palestinian officials appear to prefer Israel as an economic partner.

At issue is who will operate the banks in the territories with the onset of autonomy and the influx of foreign aid.

Forty-six nations pledged $2 billion (US) in aid over five years at a conference in Washington last October.

Much of that international aid, targeted to develop the Palestinian economy, will presumably be administered by the banks, which will profit from the customary fees and charges.

The quest for banking rights is seen as the reason why King Hussein pressured the PLO to sign the financial accord and meanwhile concluded his own banking accord with Israel.

But the Jordanians are not the only ones who want a piece of the action. Similar motivations are said to be behind a recent agreement between Israeli and Palestinian business leaders.

According to some observers, it is the Israeli-Palestinian option that is favored within some quarters of the PLO.

"The PLO has made clear that it will not surrender its financial and economic independence in the territories, and will not deposit its aid money in Jordanian banks," Sevar Plotzker, economics correspondent for Israel's Yediot Achronot newspaper, wrote recently.

And there are indications from PLO officials that the Palestinians would prefer financial co-operation with the Israelis, he added.

In December, Israel's Bank Leumi announced the formation of a new commercial bank in conjunction with Spanish, Moroccan and Palestinian partners. It will take over the two existing Bank Leumi branches in the West Bank cities of Bethlehem and Hebron.

The new bank will be launched with $40 million in initial capital, and the partners include the Casablanca-based Banque Commerciale du Maroc and the Madrid-based Banco Central Hispano.

The Palestinian partners are said to be close to the PLO and to include residents inside and outside the territories who are keeping a low profile.

"We hope to deal with the lion's share of the international aid to the Palestinians," Moshe Sanbar, chairman of the board of directors of Bank Leumi, was quoted as telling Yediot.

Sanbar added that, as far as he knew, PLO leadership in Tunis, including PLO chairman Yasser Arafat, is "in the picture."

The bank is in the process of incorporation — Sanbar complained about the paperwork imposed by the Spanish bureaucracy — but even its registration will not make it a reality.

The bank's future, of course, depends on Arafat, and it is not yet clear how solid his commitment is.

"I believe that chairman Arafat has not decided to go ahead with this project or any project," said Mohamed Rabie, a Palestinian economist who heads the Center for Educational Development in Washington.

"Anything you hear has to have his green light, and he has not given any green light."

Rabie said that the joint Israeli-Palestinian bank had long been rumored and that the a key figure mentioned in the rumor has denied involvement.

But such a venture is considered impossible until the Israel and the PLO reach a political settlement.

Among Palestinians, said Rabie, "there are people who are working very hard to lay the ground for joint ventures and some who are opposed to any kind of concrete movement until the political situation is clear."

He said he had friends in Jordan who conceived joint projects during the initial euphoria over the signing of the Israeli-PLO accord last September, but who have since backed up in light of the slow progress of the talks designed to implement the autonomy plan.

According to Yediot, the Bank Leumi-Palestinian partnership was suggested by Palestinians, shortly after Jordan reached an agreement on banking with Israel.

The Jordanian agreement was signed Dec. 5 in Washington by representatives of the Bank of Israel and the Jordanian central bank, and it paved the way for the speedy reopening of Jordanian banks in the West Bank.

Palestinians reportedly were furious over the accord, but Israelis explained that they were bound to adhere to international agreements concerning supervision of banks.

Nonetheless, it is interesting to note that, according to Yediot, none of the other clauses in the far-reaching economic accord reached between Israel and Jordan last fall have yet to be implemented.

If the multinational consortium does succeed in turning the present Bank Leumi offices in the territories into a Palestinian banking force during the autonomy period, there will be symbolic significance as well. Bank Leumi, after all, was founded by the Zionist movement in 1902. (JTA)

Ethical wills raise some interesting thoughts

By ALLAN GOULD

Are you familiar with the very beautiful Jewish tradition of ethical wills? Sure, we all know about those legal wills, where we divide up our goods among our (usually thankless) descendants. (You must recall the classic about the nephew who constantly bugs his uncle to "remember me in your will! Please, please, please — remember me in your will!" So, after the old man passes away, the lawyer reads: "To my wife, I leave the house; to my son, the family business. And to my nephew Mendel, who was forever begging me to 'remember me' in my will: Hello there, Mendel!")

Well, I was recently re-reading one of my favorite Jewish books: The very beautiful "treasury" of Ethical Wills, published over a decade ago by Schocken Books, and edited by my good friend, Rabbi Jack Riemer, of Cong. Beth David in Miami. And I was deeply moved to read the highly moral, often profound suggestions made by Jewish parents to their children, urging them to give tzedakah, be true to their faith, and so on.

Which got me thinking (uh-oh). . . .

An Ethical Will For Our Times, by Mendel

Blessed be those who read this will, and even more blessed be those who follow it:

— Be sure to take a nap every afternoon. Your boss probably won't notice, and you've had a hard morning.

— Being in love is never having to say you're sorry. But if it's with that character, you'd better be prepared to.

— Always barter, so you can avoid paying federal taxes.

— Never eat more than you can lift. Miss Piggy said that, but since she will clearly live forever, unlike yours truly, she obviously knew what she was talking about.

— Keep whatever you say very, very simple. That way, your so-called "superiors" at work will finally understand.

— Avoid any dubious and questionable business deals, and whatever else is contrary to the laws of the land. After all, why else did the Holy One, Blessed be He, create lawyers?

Allan Gould

— Wear clean underwear outside your garments now and then. It worked for Madonna, and it could work for you, too.

— Commit many, many acts of "random kindness." Random violence, you can always catch on television.

— Smile at every single person whom you meet in your daily travels. It will make them all wonder what the heck you are up to.

— All you need is Love. Rrrat-da-da-da-da-da. All you need is Love. Rrrat-da-da-da-da-da. All you need is Love. Love. Love is all you need. Love is all you need.

— Never, ever expect money to buy you happiness. Money can only buy you the things which can make you happy.

— Always shake hands warmly with everyone you meet. This way, if they've got a weapon, you find out fast.

— Avoid entering into partnerships with someone else unless it is absolutely, positively necessary. Especially with your cousin Hartley.

— Take a short time out, every single day, and think about the purpose of your existence in the world. Aren't you a little ashamed of yourself?

— Take full responsibility for every day of your life on this earth. At night, however, you can occasionally be a tiny bit irresponsible.

— How your cousin Hartley has remained out of jail, I have no idea. Have you been able to figure it out?

— Marry only for love, my child. But if your loved one happens to have oodles of money, that's okay, too.

— Remove yourself from anger if at all possible. If this means escaping for a few weeks every other month from your children, I can well understand.

— Whistle out loud, and with great joy and abandon. However, do not whistle at an associate at work. Sexual harrassment charges, like diamonds, can be forever.

— Deal faithfully. But when it is time for someone else to deal, keep a close eye on the cards.

— A woman who is in love is incomplete, until is she married. Then she is finished. (Zsa Zsa Gabor said that first, and if she doesn't know the truth in that, who does?)

— Learn a trade that is simple and honest. In other words, never run for elected office.

— Blessed are the young, for they shall inherit the federal deficit.

— You more than likely have a novel within you. That is the best place for it, I can assure you.

— If you drink beer and smoke, you will be gloriously happy in life. Well, that's what the commercials and the advertisements always claimed, and notice that the person who wrote this will for your edification is now one with the earth.

— Never, ever raise your hand to your child. It will leave your chest and stomach dangerously unprotected.

— If you ever hesitate, you are not only lost, but probably 25 kilometres from the next exit.

— Deep down — truly deep down — most people you meet are probably superficial.

— If you do end up with the chance to have your life to live over, I suggest living over a shopping centre; it'll save you lots of time and energy.

— Nothing is forever on this Earth. Nothing at all. Which is why you should play Pro-Line Basketball while you can.

A romance with Russia

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Nearly half a million Jews have left the old Soviet Union in the past four years, and although aliyah has decreased since the heady days of 1990 and 1991, more than 60,000 Jews are expected to emigrate by year's end.

But that still leaves hundreds of thousands who have no immediate or distant plans to leave.

They are remaining in Russia — a former Soviet republic — despite hyper-inflation, the rumbling of political instability and the persistence of anti-Semitism.

A tall, red-headed, smartly-dressed freelance journalist and occasional English interpreter, Amonova does not consider herself an assimilated Jew remote from her roots, like so many Russian Jews.

Indeed, Amanova attends synagogue on high holidays, and moves in Jewish circles. She has worked for the Confederation of Jewish Organizations and Communities (Vaad), the umbrella group of Russian Jewry. She is a member of a Hadassah-Wizo chapter. She has written for various Jewish publications, including the Jewish Gazette and Moscow Yerushalayim. And currently, she freelances for Yom Shaini, a Jewish bulletin in Moscow, and for the Russian press in Israel.

Amanova's grandparents were Polish Jews who settled in Russia before the 1917 Bolshevik revolution. Well-off, they lived in St. Petersburg.

Amonova's parents were government workers, her mother having been employed by the Soviet Ministry of Culture and her father having been an official in an economics ministry.

As a child, Amanova was taken to Simchat Torah celebrations at Moscow's Choral Synagogue. "I was proud to be a Jew," she said. And occasionally, her grandmother would regale her with stories about ancient Jewish history.

But in common with the majority of her fellow Soviet Jews, Amanova's knowledge of Judaism and Jewish culture was scant. "I didn't know anything," she recalled.

"I was not a dissident, but I was an opponent of the oppressive Soviet system," she explained.

In 1972, after taking part in an illegal demonstration in the centre of Moscow, she was arrested and charged with having maintained illegal contacts with foreign correspondents.

"It was a terrible experience," she said.

Amanova was forced to drink a liquid laced with drugs which induced a perpetual state of drowsiness.

Amanova spent several months in purgatory, and after her release, she decided to emigrate to Israel. She never made it. She fell in love with a man who had no interest in living in Israel (and with whom she later broke up).

In addition, her parents were opposed to the idea. "In material terms, they had a good life in Moscow — a flat, a dacha (cottage in the country), a car."

In 1974, shortly after her marriage to a Russian film producer, she began studying ethnography. Amanova learned a lot about practically every nationality in the Soviet Union — there were over 100 — but absolutely nothing about Jews.

She spoke to her teacher, a Russian, about this glaring discrepancy. Rather than being offended by her pointed question, he instructed her in Jewish history and gave her books to read.

Fired up by this information, she joined an illegal underground Hebrew ulpan and began studying Judaism. She did not, however, pack up and leave the Soviet Union.

"I was happily married, and I was travelling a lot with my husband. I had a good life. Frankly, I didn't think of emigration."

In all probability, she lost her taste for aliyah when, in the early 1980s, she met disenchanted Soviet Jews who had returned from Israel with complaints of the hardships they had encountered there.

She has yet to visit Israel, where several of her cousins live. "On my salary, I can't afford the airplane tickets," she said.

Although she has relatives in the United States, Amanova has not set her sights on that country either. "I am very attached to Russian ways and to the Russian language."

Anti-Semitism, a nagging problem for numerous Soviet Jews, has not really affected her. "I move in progressive circles," she explained.

Amanova, whose second husband is a Jewish construction engineer, can contemplate emigration only under certain circumstances. "If fascists and Nazis came to power in Russia, I would leave."

Though relieved that Russian President Boris Yeltsin was able to crush the Oct. 4 putsch in Moscow, which had the support of right-wing nationalists and fascist elements, Amanova is plainly uncertain of the future.

"We won today. But what will tomorrow bring?"

* * *

Like Amanova, Nicolai Propirny is a journalist. He is on the staff of a business newspaper, but previously, he reported for the Jewish Gazette. A graduate of the Moscow Pedagogical Training University, he studied Russian language and literature.

The son of a mathematician, he was raised in a completely secular environment. At his parents' request, he registered as a Russian rather than as a Jew in his internal Soviet passport. He could make this choice because his paternal grandmother was Russian.

Propirny's parents were not self-hating Jews or apostates. Being familiar with the Soviet system, where state anti-Semitism was endemic, they felt he would have a better chance of succeeding if he was officially registered as a Russian.

They were not alone in that belief. For convenience sake, numerous Jews of mixed descent chose that very route. "I know a lot of 'Jewish' Russians," he said.

While most have permanently distanced themselves from their Jewish past and faded into the Russian mainstream, some have been rudely reminded of it by reactionary Russians.

Propirny, who is uncircumcised, has never run into this problem. Simply, anti-Semitism has not been a factor in his life.

Till the age of 17, he felt totally Russian. But then something profound happened, something that would alter his life.

"I began to feel Jewish."

On a visit to Odessa, he met his grandfather's brother. From him, he learned about the Holocaust, a subject no Soviet school offered its students. Communism forbade references to the Holocaust as a distinctly Jewish tragedy. It was buried under the rubble of World War II.

But having been given a glimpse into the abyss of the Holocaust, Propirny was driven by a curiosity to plumb the depths of his Jewish ancestry.

In the early 1990s, on the eve of the dissolution of the Soviet Union and the demise of communism there, he took up the study of Judaism and Jewish history. His teacher was a visiting Reform rabbi from the United States. He pored over books for six months, filling in yawning gaps.

Today, he considers himself a secular Jew. Although he is irreligious, he tries to observe major Jewish holidays.

Propirny's wife is Russian. Her met her at university, and they have a daughter. She is not being raised "in a specifically Jewish way." In deference to his wife, who is not a convert to Judaism, he will let his daughter determine her identity herself.

Two years ago, he considered aliyah, but upon reflection, he changed his mind. "I decided it wasn't for me."

He wants to remain in Russia. "For me, literature begins with Pushkin, not Sholem Aleichem," he explained.

"I feel very much attached to Russian literature and language. It would be impossible for me to live without it."

Apart from Abu Nidal, who may or may not be alive, Ahmed Jibril holds the dubious distinction of being the most ardent rejectionist in the Palestinian camp.

Jibril, the leader of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine — General Command (PFLP—GC), has launched numerous operations against Israel since the mid-1960s. Backed by Syria, Libya and Iran, Jibril vehemently opposes the PLO's 1993 agreement with Israel on limited Palestinian self-rule. Born in Palestine 57 years ago, Jibril wants nothing less than Israel's destruction. Of course, he is contemptuous of PLO chieftain Yasser Arafat, whom he considers a traitor to the Palestinian cause. Indeed, Jibril has openly called for his assassination.

A fanatic by any definition, Jibril has a long view of history. In a rare interview with an American journalist, he declared: "We (the Palestinians) must continue in the armed struggle at any price. We fought for 150 years against the crusaders until we won, and we are now only fighting Israel for a little over 40 years."

His faith in ultimate victory may be misplaced. Israel, after all, is strong and resilient. Be that as it may, Jibril is doing his utmost to undermine the Jewish state.

Whatever one thinks of Jibril, the fact of the matter is that he is probably Israel's most dangerous, dedicated Palestinian foe, suggests Samuel Katz in Israel Versus Jibril (Fitzhenry & Whiteside, $34).

Although the PFLP — GC is one of the smallest factions in the Palestinian movement, with no more than about 2,000 fighters, Jibril's group is militarily professional. As a former captain in the Syrian army, Jibril has transmitted his skills to his lieutenants and his foot soldiers quite deftly.

Over the years, he has taken responsibility for a string of spectacularly deadly deeds — the bombing of Swissair flight 330, which killed 47 passengers; the attack on a school bus in the Galilee which claimed the lives of 11 children and three teachers; the assault on an apartment building in Kiryat Shmoneh which left 16 dead; the hang-glider attack in northern Israel which resulted in the deaths of six soldiers; the bombing of a Pan Am plane which killed 270; the ambush of an Israeli bus in the Sinai which took the lives of nine Israelis.

Israel has tried to eliminate Jibril. "Israel's defence establishment has dedicated much of its resources to bring about Jibril's termination," observes Katz, a writer on Israeli security.

The air force has mounted numerous preemptive and retaliatory raids against his bases in Lebanon, while the army has dispatched some of its finest commando units to find and kill Jibril. In 1986, Israel went as far as to intercept an aircraft Jibril was believed to be on. To its embarrassment, he was not on board the Libyan Gulfstream jet. Instead, a dozen high-ranking members of Syria's ruling Ba'ath party were found on the plane. They were promptly released.

Israel's failure to pin down Jibril, Katz theorizes, stems from its inability to penetrate his organization. For obviously good reasons, the PFLP — GC is extremely secretive.

According to Katz, Syrian intelligence agencies and military commands have been involved with "every aspect of the PFLP — GC's operational existence." However, much of its equipment has been bought and paid for by Libya and, more lately, Iran.

Before the collapse of the Soviet Union in 1991, Moscow was Jibril's main supplier, providing him with a range of weapons from AK assault rifles to 23-mm anti-aircraft guns.

The Soviets, Katz adds, also trained his men in secret camps near Moscow and the Black Sea. They were given instruction in combat, marksmanship, urban guerrilla strategy, camouflage and deception, intelligence and counter-intelligence.

The demise of the Soviet Union has undoubtedly been a terrific blow to Jibril, as it has been to Syria, Libya and others in the Arab world. But if the past is any guide, Jibril will not be daunted by this development. Adaptable and resourceful, Jibril intends to fight Israel to the last drop of his blood.

Kach brands peace negotiations a disaster for Israel

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Israel's negotiations with the PLO are leading the country to disaster, with the Palestinians clinging to their ultimate desire to dismantle the state of Israel, two Kach spokesmen stated recently in Toronto.

Furthermore, they are being aided in their designs by the Rabin government which is prepared to relinquish control of Judea, Samaria, Gaza and the Golan Heights and integrate Israel with a new Palestinian state, said Rachiman Cohen, legal counsel to the Kach movement in Israel.

"This is a spiritual process I call the de-Zionization and de-Judaization of the Israeli state," Cohen said. "That means the abandonment of any basic Jewish faith, values or ideal of Zionism."

Speaking to 18 people at the Zionist Centre on Marlee Avenue, Cohen asserted that the current Israeli government does not care about the Jewish and Zionist character of the state. That is why they can consider abandoning the tombs of the patriarchs and matriarchs in Hebron and other holy sites. The government doesn't care about the past; "it means nothing to them," Cohen said.

Furthermore, he continued, Israel's secular establishment wants to create a liberal democracy that promotes equality and where "anyone who declares priorities for Jews is declared a racist."

Turning to the negotiations to implement the Israeli/PLO accord, Cohen said, "There is no chance this process will bring real peace." If, for the sake of argument, it did, a peace without Israel retaining Gaza, the Golan Heights, Judea and Samaria is "a peace I don't want."

Cohen said the Israeli right wing, ranging from Likud to Kach, has coalesced into a bloc with the common goal of stopping the peace process. While the participants disagree over tactics, Kach has called for a massive civil disobedience campaign similar to the demonstrations that persuaded the U.S. government to change its policy during the Vietnam War. Kach has also established a committee to provide security on the roads that link various settlements.

Cohen said Israeli settlers can be expected to echo the Arab call for autonomy. "If the Arabs have the right to demand autonomy, why don't the Jews demand that same right in Judea and Samaria?" he said.

Cohen's sometimes dry delivery was followed by the more fiery oration of Herb Sunshine, a former press secretary to Rabbi Meir Kahane, who founded Kach.

Sunshine pulled no punches when he called the government of Israel "treasonous" and stated that "[it] has lost its mind."

It is releasing Palestinian terrorists from jail and handing them weapons while disarming Jewish settlers, he said.

Israel's Arab foes still adhere to the policy of pan-Arabism with the goal of world conquest, beginning with the subjugation of "the Saturday people," followed by conquest of "the Sunday people," he asserted.

The PLO charter, he continued, has not been amended and it continues to call for the destruction of Israel. Meanwhile Israel, which has won five wars against the Arabs, is giving up too much territory. Instead of being weak-kneed, it should flex its muscles and dictate terms. If the Arabs don't like the Israeli offer, they can leave, he said.

Failure to be firm, combined with an unseemly obedience of U.S. dictates, shows "a lack of Jewish pride." Quoting Rabbi Kahane, Sunshine said Jews "should be a light unto the nations, not a yahrzeit candle."

Crisis response team launched

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The unexpected death of a young adult member of the Winnipeg Jewish community last fall has sparked the creation of a Jewish Community Crisis Response Coordinating Committee to deal with similar traumas that may affect elements of the community in future.

The committee is composed of Rabbi Henry Balser of the Shaarey Zedek Synagogue representing the Winnipeg Council of Rabbis; Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate principal Jerry Cohen representing the Board of Jewish Education; Les Marks, executive director of the YMHA Jewish Community Centre; Barney Yellen, executive director of the Jewish Child and Family Services; and Evelyn Hecht representing the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council.

As Hecht notes, committee members have already dealt with crises resulting from suicide and untimely death, cemetery vandalism and even a fire at Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate a few years ago — but on an individual basis.

"With this committee, we will be able to avoid duplication of services," Hecht says. "If a traumatic situation does occur, any member of the committee can be notified. Then we can meet and determine how to respond to the issue. We felt it was really important to be able to work out and co-ordinate our responses and determine which agency or group of agencies can best handle the matter."

The committee, Hecht notes, is modelled after similar committees in the general community. To her knowledge, there are no other Jewish communities in Canada with a committee like this. She reports that when the committee holds its third meeting in February, it will seek to determine what steps need to be taken to create a youth suicide prevention program. After the meeting, response sheets will be distributed by committee members to their constituents, with the feedback to be discussed at the following meeting. The goal is to create another committee composed of professional and lay people to coordinate the suicide prevention program.

When Rhonda met Brian ... it was love

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Chalk up another big-time "Yes" for Jewish Dateline.

After eight years in the business of pairing Jewish singles in and around Metro, Dateline boasts an average 10 marriages a year, but executive director and official community shadchan Debbie Cowitz still pops her buttons every time the big M happens.

The latest happy couple to meet and become betrothed, thanks to Dateline, is Rhonda Shulman, a 28-year-old nutritionist, and Brian Prosserman, 30, a buyer for a menswear chain.

Jewish Dateline matched the two last April. After four dates, the couple became, well, a couple, and marriage was proposed in November.

One could say this one was bashert. For Shulman, it was the seventh fix-up, and the sixth for Prosserman. The couple even concedes that their first three dates weren't exactly memorable.

"But we kept trying," says Shulman. "And we never would have met if it hadn't been for Dateline."

Set up to counter rising intermarriage rates, Jewish Dateline is funded by Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto and maintains a client roster of about 500, ranging in age from 20 to 80.

The service has its work cut out: Cowitz estimates there are up to 30,000 Jewish singles in and around Toronto, many of whom have to be prodded to date other Jews.

So far, Dateline has brought together about 3,000 people, some from as far as New York state, she notes.

For an annual fee of $210, a client completes an extensive questionaire that gauges attitudes on everything from smoking, degree of religious observance, education levels and mates with children. Cowitz then conducts personal interviews.

The data are fed into a computer, which recommends a match-up. But mostly, it's Cowitz's fine-tuned sixth sense that spots when the chemistry is right between two people.

With a proven track record, Cowitz is quick to dispel the lingering stigma associated with going to a dating service.

"There's absolutely nothing wrong with coming here. The bells don't always ring the first time, but it's a great option. We give hope."

"After 30 years, I thought, 'G-d had His chance; now, I'm going to give Him some help,' " Prosserman says.

The service's latest project is Sunday brunches, held about every six weeks in a private home, for no more than 20 people.

New social group launched for Ottawa young Jewish adults

By MIRIAM SOBEL
CJN Correspondent

OTTAWA — A successful social group for young Jewish adults in Montreal and Toronto has spawned a new chapter. The Ottawa Association for Young Jewish Adults will hold its inaugural event, a party at a local club, Maxwell's Bistro, on Feb. 13.

The Association for Young Jewish Adults (AYJA) was started seven years ago in Montreal, following a succession of failed 'singles' clubs.

"If you only have singles it's a very uncomfortable atmosphere and everyone's looking at each other, it's like a meat market," says Michael Cohen, 31, national chair of AYJA and one of the original members of the Montreal group.

The idea was to hold events where young Jewish men and women, both couples and singles, could make friends, not necessarily marriages, with people their own age.

"There's that stigma [associated with singles' groups], and we took that stigma away," says Cohen.

People may come to make friends, but says Cohen, "we're responsible for at least 100 marriages."

Four years ago Toronto started an AYJA chapter that has been just as successful. Cohen, with unabashed zeal, has met with people in Winnipeg, Calgary and Vancouver to encourage them to start chapters. In August he visited Ottawa and left behind an organizing committee that bubbles with enthusiasm.

Co-chair Elayna Katz says once they have left school, it's not easy for people her age to meet Jewish friends. AYJA provides a meeting ground.

"I'm excited about the fact that I'm going to meet new people. At the age we're at, when we've finished university, or are coming back after university, or have moved here to start a new job, it's a nice way for people to get together."

Until this year, Ottawa had a tottering 'singles' group.

"I went twice," says Katz, " and even the second time I had to be dragged."

The advantage of AYJA, she says, is that it is open to anyone, as long as they are Jewish and between the ages of 23 and 35. Married couples, dating couples, buddies, or groups of men and women can come. And because Ottawa and Montreal are so close, and Ottawa is home to so many former Montrealers, she hopes members in the two cities will attend one another's events.

"We hope that people will make lasting friendships. That's really what we're striving for," says Katz.

Ottawa's opening affair will be a party at Maxwell's Bistro, 340 Elgin St., Feb. 13 at 8:00 p.m. Admission is $5 plus a food donation to the local food bank.

Yeshiva U graduates reach out to Winnipeg high school students

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Miriam Abbott's need to share her knowledge of Judaism and strengthen Jewish identity for others brought her back to Winnipeg. For Ari Israel, it was another opportunity to teach students about their Jewish heritage and identity.

The two Yeshiva University graduate students and future Jewish educators were among a group of 11 Yeshiva U students who visited Winnipeg's Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate (JWC) last month as part of a program called Counterpoint.

Now in its 14th year at the Winnipeg Jewish high school, Counterpoint was introduced by school principal Jerry Cohen and then vice-principal Rabbi Charles Grysman. Counterpoint is run by the New York university only at JWC and a few Australian Jewish high schools.

The name comes from the intensity of the intellectual and spiritual experience, explains Barry Bender, director of Kiruv, Yeshiva U's outreach program. Bender was in Winnipeg for the eighth time.

The 12-day program included two Jewish awareness weekend retreats led by the Yeshiva University students at a camp 120 kilometres northeast of Winnipeg. The topics discussed were chosen by the JWC students in the fall and sent to Bender for research. They included why bad things happen to good people, women in Judaism, Jewish sexual ethics, the Middle East peace process and interfaith relations.

"We bring our own food and establish an eruv around the camp," says JWC vice-principal Chaim Shiel. "There is time for outdoor activities such as skating on the lake, skiing and snowshoeing as well as discussions on Jewish law and Tanach and more general topics."

For the junior high school students who do not participate in the retreat, the Yeshiva U students provided three yomiyim or half-day programs focusing on Jewish themes. There were also evening programs aimed at enhancing the students' feelings of Judaism and reponsibility to their community.

The Yeshiva University students, Bender says, were chosen for their openess, personality and pluralistic values. "We make sure they are respectful of Joseph Wolinsky students' backgrounds and values," he says. "Some have been back several times. I have found that most want to come back but often they have graduated and have jobs."

Abbott came back because she felt she made connections with some of the JWC students last year. "I love the kids here," she says. "They have great personalities. I kept in touch with some of them over the year by phone and letter."

She feels Counterpoint and in particular the retreat has a tremendous impact on the students, imparting a lot of knowledge in a short time.

Fellow Yeshiva U student Israel describes the Joseph Wolinsky students as very intellectual, inquisitive and analytical. He has also been with Counterpoint in Australia. While the schools there had larger student bodies, he finds JWC's student body of 272 more cohesive.

Among the other Yeshiva University students who came to Winnipeg, Avrumi Sacks was also back for his second year while Joshua Lookstein returned for the fourth time. First time participants were Rachel Levitt, Tamar David, Chavie Levine, Yitzi Glicksman, Amir Perlson, Isaac Lifshutz and David Kaplan.

Bender reports that a Shabbaton led by Yeshiva University students is being planned for Hebrew Academy high school in Montreal.

The university also has a program of Torah Tours, co-ordinated by Aaron Tirschwell, which puts its students into North American Jewish communities like Toronto for programs that are not as intense as Counterpoint.

Synagogue plans AIDS panel

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — "How do we overcome the fear that prevents us from reaching out to AIDS sufferers? How do we comfort them, their families, their friends, when society leaves them to suffer in silent isolation? Our tradition in enjoining us not to stand idly by the pain of others compels us to seek out the answers to these questions," says Rabbi Philip Scheim.

To address issues surrounding Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome (AIDS), Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation, of which Rabbi Scheim is spiritual leader, is presenting a panel discussion, AIDS: Reality and Responsibility, on Feb. 17 at 8 p.m.

The program, which is a project of the shul's continuing education committee, will be moderated by Paul Cross of CHUM Radio, writer/producer of an award-winning radio documentary on AIDS in Canada. Also scheduled to participate are AIDS expert Dr. Philip Berger; Dr. Donna Keystone, HIV primary care specialist and past chair of Holy Blossom Temple's AIDS committee; author June Callwood, founder of Casey House Hospice for AIDS; Eva, a mother who lost her son to AIDS; and Kael, a man living with AIDS. Rabbi Scheim will introduce the program.

"We see this [program] as the initial step in an ongoing process of education and providing support," said Debbie Dash, director of programming and outreach for the synagogue. "We have an informal [AIDS] committee working on this program, and they have expressed a desire to continue their efforts.

There is no admission charge for the panel discussion. Beth David is located at 55 Yeomans Rd. in Downsview.

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — "If you know anybody who is a victim of sexual assault or wife assault, encourage them to get some treatment," urged Joan Hurley of Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS) at a recent program of York University's Jewish Student Federation on Violence Against Women in the Jewish Community.

Hurley, who runs groups for assaulted women at JF&CS, said that wife abuse "is happening in the Jewish community at all levels of observance and in all socio-economic groups." Abused Jewish women didn't use to report the abuse, perpetuating the myth that it didn't occur in the Jewish community, she said.

Because abuse is often repeated by subsequent generations, Hurley said, treatment can make "a significant difference in the lives of the [abused] wives and children."

Research has shown that children who witness violence between their parents are as traumatized as if they themselves had been beaten. Twenty-five per cent of the children in one study, all of whom had witnessed violence, felt it was appropriate for a husband to strike his wife if the house was messy. After receiving counselling, none of them felt this way, Hurley said. "It's important to get to them and change these values before they have children of their own."

"Everybody has arguments," said Hurley. "An abuse relationship is different. [An abusive] husband purposefully intends to establish control over his wife through systematic and repetitive psychological trauma. There may be physical abuse, but there's always emotional abuse."

Threatening to harm the wife or anyone close to her and taking away any sense of power on her part are types of emotional abuse, said Hurley. It's common for an abused wife to have to ask permission to go on outings or purchase clothing for the children and then to have to hand over receipts and have the mileage on her car monitored.

"She often hears that she's incapable of doing anything; that everything's her fault. After a while it becomes like a form of brainwashing, and she begins to believe it herself," said Hurley.

In fact, abused women are generally responsible for everything involved in running their homes, she noted. They are "incredibly competent," although they don't see themselves that way.

In contrast, the abuser may be "incredibly charming in most circumstances, so it's very hard to believe he's capable of that level of abuse." Many abusers have a history of family violence, although Hurley emphasized that witnessing parental violence doesn't necessarily lead someone to be an abuser. Other common characteristics of abusers include low self-esteem (which may be hidden), rigid thinking, limited tolerance for frustration, a desire to control and overpower their wives, and refusing to take blame when things go wrong.

Abuse will not go away with a year or two of treatment, warned Hurley. Abusers have "long-term, serious personality disorders that require long-term treatment." Group therapy has been found to be most effective for abusers, she added, because they are less likely to out-argue their way out of responsibility than they would be in a one-on-one situation.

Group therapy is also effective for victims who have had individual treatment in that it "normalizes" the experience, she said. "[They realize that] they're not the only ones. Having other people help you to heal is very important. It's one thing to hear a therapist tell you it's not your fault. It's another thing to hear other women [reacting as you did]. Then you can see it." (JF&CS is now establishing groups for adult women survivors of sexual assault or date rape, and incest.)

In rare cases, the pattern of abuse is reversed, with the wife abusing the husband. Research puts the number of such cases at five per cent or less, noted Hurley.

"Victims need support from the community," she said.

JNF Negev Dinner to honor Ticks for commitment to Jewish causes

By MOURA WOLPERT

HAMILTON — Stan and Liz Tick, a couple well-known for their community involvement and commitment to Jewish causes, have been named Hamilton's 1994 Negev Dinner honorees.

The Jewish National Fund's (JNF) annual tribute dinner will take place Sunday, May 29, 6 p.m. at the Hamilton Convention Centre.

This marks the first time in over 20 years that the dinner will not be held at Adas Israel Synagogue. But with over 550 guests expected to attend this year's event, it was decided to move it to the larger convention centre, said Hamilton-based regional JNF shaliach Yoram Gordon.

This is not the first community tribute to the Ticks. In 1991, Liz was the honoree at the annual Israel Bonds women's division luncheon, while Stan was honored at the 1992 annual combined Bonds-B'nai Brith of Hamilton breakfast.

The popular Hamilton couple were married in 1962, following Liz's graduation from the University of Toronto School of Physical and Occupational Therapy and while Stan was a student at Osgoode Hall Law School. They returned to Hamilton following Stan's call to the bar, with honors, in 1965.

Now a prominent city lawyer, Stan served as federal narcotics prosecutor for Hamilton-Wentworth from 1970 to 1984. In 1981 he was appointed Queen's Counsel and in 1988, he was certified as a specialist in civil litigation by the Law Society of Upper Canada.

In addition to holding office in various professional organizations and serving as president of the Hamilton Medical-Legal Society 1984-1985, Stan has served as a board member of Temple Anshe Sholom, president of Hamilton Lodge, B'nai Brith and as chair of the Hamilton United Jewish Appeal (UJA).

He is a past president of the Hamilton Jewish Federation and a past president and former chair, Hamilton JNF. Since 1985 he has been serving as vice-president, Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region.

Stan is also the founder and chair of the Beth Tikvah Foundation, a home for mentally handicapped older Jewish adults.

Actively involved from the time she was a youngster with Temple Anshe Sholom Youth League, Liz joined Anna Herscovitz Chapter of Hadassah-WIZO as a young bride and has held numerous positions at both chapter and council levels.

She is a past Hadassah-WIZO president and has also served as co-convenor of the organization's two biggest fundraisers, the annual bazaar and the Jewish community telephone directory.

Involved in the UJA women's division, Liz served as women's division campaign chair in 1981. She is an active member of the Israel Bonds women's division and is a canvasser for the Canadian Society and the Heart and Stroke Foundation.

In the mid-1980s she returned to U of T for a refresher course and now works part time as a physio-therapist.

The Tick family includes daughter Jackie and her husband, Kevin Barwin, who are expecting their first child later this spring, and two sons, Howie and Robbie.

The dinner will be chaired by Bill Halpren, long-time treasurer and board member of the Hamilton-Wentworth & Area Federation, and his wife Marcia, owners of a travel business.

Proceeds from the event will go towards the Reshavim water reservoir in the Jordan valley.

Family Matters

by

John Syrtash, B.A. (Hon.), LL.B.

Women in distress: Legal Aid or a private lawyer?

Currently, the Attorney General of Ontario, Marion Boyd, and the Law Society of Upper Canada disagree on Boyd's proposal to set up government-funded "women's only" family law clinics in Ontario. In fairness to the Law Society, the major objection was to a "gender-based" clinic, although there was apparently little opposition to special clinics for "abused women" and certainly not for family law clinics that did not discriminate their services based on gender alone.

Women without money

Economically disadvantaged women seeking to take legal action against their husbands for support, property division, custody of children, and protection from abusive husbands usually succeed in obtaining a "Legal Aid Certificate". However, if these women then want to find an experienced lawyer whose preferred area of practise is family law, they often have a great deal of trouble doing so, particularly in large metropolitan areas. Such a lawyer's overhead costs, computed on an hourly basis, often equal or exceed what Legal Aid pays (the top Legal Aid hourly payment is under $90 per hour, whereas some experienced lawyers normally charge as much as $250 to $350 per hour).

Mickey Mouse versus King Kong

Some lawyers are also wary of taking on Legal Aid briefs since they are often at least as time-consuming as non-Legal Aid cases. In a few instances, some Legal Aid clients abuse the program by constantly calling the lawyer or insisting on certain Legal Steps about which they might normally be more careful if they were paying the bill themselves. Even those who "contribute" to the cost of the Certificate (either through a lien against their home or a periodic payment to the Legal Aid plan) are paying at a much lower hourly rate and are sometimes tempted to take up much more of the lawyer's time than usual.

The woman who desperately needs a Court Order, often quickly, to protect herself and her children both physically and financially, is then often "turned away" by some senior members of the Family Law Bar or by law firms who see such certificates as money-losers and too time-consuming, often at the expense of other clients. When it comes to negotiations or Court, she is then often "under-represented" by a well-meaning but junior lawyer, while her husband's lawyer is paid privately, may be more experienced, and may also have much better resources and staff. It is not always Mickey Mouse versus King Kong, but there is a definite perception that this scenario is repeated weekly.

To remedy this injustice, these "women-only" family law clinics would be staffed by full-time paid lawyers whose sole job would be to help women in legal distress. The purported object is to avoid such women having to "phone around" and worry incessantly about being poorly represented.

Many critics believe that this "remedy" would only further widen the aforementioned gap in the quality of representation. The salary such clinical lawyers are likely to be paid in the Ontario civil service would have to be commensurate with what other lawyers in that service are being paid. The clinic would then certainly not compete with compensation received by the senior Family Law Bar and would probably not attract near the level of experience the Minister may have had in mind.

Women's legal clinics: better services ... or cheaper services?

More importantly, the caseload of one such clinical lawyer will undoubtedly be overwhelming. As mentioned, each such case may be more time-consuming than the average family law matter. Accordingly, the quality of the service to be provided may even be worse than that currently available, according to these critics. Some feel that the Government's real reason for consolidating these services with clinics is to reduce their overall cost. One salaried government-paid lawyer handling one hundred such cases at once is much cheaper than hiring 100 private lawyers, even at a low hourly rate. Critics also complain of stigmatizing legal services according to sex and the discriminatory aspect of such a step.

However, those in the Ministry and in the Law Society who favour such clinics reply that a well-trained, specialized and highly computerized staff could better serve such women and their children, especially if they have government resources behind them. Moreover, there are simply no funds to attract more senior Family Law lawyers into taking legal aid certificates at a time of severe budget cutbacks at all levels of government.

I suspect this controversy will be resolved. At least the problem is being seriously discussed. Action may be imminent, although I would hope that it will be driven more by a desire to help the lady in distress than to reduce the deficit.

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Eight-year-old David Blum, a Grade 3 student at Associated Hebrew Day Schools, recently received a 1993 financial aid award from the Alexander Graham Bell Association for the Deaf, an international organization based in Washington, D.C.

The annual awards are given to oral and hearing impaired independent or-parochial school students under 21 who communicate through lipreading and speaking. The association distributed 95 awards totalling $64,000 in 1993. David was recommended for the Bell Award by his principal, his teachers and his rabbi. David's mother, Kathleen Blum, said his $1,000 award went toward day school tuition.

In most ways, in spite of becoming profoundly deaf at three months of age after a bout of meningitis, David is just like any other eight-year-old. He goes horseback riding, ice-skates, rollerblades and swims; he loves sports, watches TV, plays Nintendo, talks on the telephone and likes Archie comics. Along with gym, his favorite subjects at school are math and English.

However, unlike the average eight-year-old, he already has had a major public speaking engagement. Last summer a speech David gave to members of the board of the Canadian Hearing Society resulted in their successfully lobbying the government to have OHIP cover his cochlear implant, a device he uses to hear with. The same speech was also the impetus for the society to begin fundraising so teachers for hearing disabled children could be sent to remote communities.

"They couldn't believe he spoke so well," said Kathleen Blum. Some deaf people speak in a monotone and their speech has a hollow tone, but not David. He speaks like a person who has normal hearing.

David Blum

His mother recalled that David had learned to speak only about 30 words, through lipreading, by the time he was 2½, even with auditory and verbal therapy taken at a North York General Hospital program. "He had hearing aids, but we realized they didn't work," she said.

Kathleen Blum and her husband Max felt they had no alternative but to investigate the cochlear implant. The implant allows deaf people to at least hear environmental sounds; at best it allows them to understand human speech, but it does not pick up the vast array of sounds heard by a normal human ear.

David received his implant when he was 2½ at a New York City hospital, as no one in Canada was doing the procedure at the time. It took six months for him to respond to the sounds he heard, said Kathleen Blum, because he had no memory of hearing.

At that point, David began learning how to speak. "Every word he learned was repeated a thousand times," said Blum. "It was not automatic by any stretch. Everyone in the family would constantly talk to him."

David continued taking auditory and verbal therapy at the hospital while he attended special junior and senior kindergarten classes for hearing disabled children in the mornings and a neighborhood public school in the afternoons. "That was his first encounter with hearing children," said his mother. "He was starting to make short sentences, he was starting to gain confidence."

David started in Grade 1 at Associated Hebrew Day Schools, where he was enrolled in a double curriculum — half a day English and half a day Hebrew. "To learn a second language is very difficult for hearing impaired children," said Blum.

She added that David is now doing fine in Grade 3, although his vocabulary is not quite up to his grade level. "He's learned to raise his hand and ask questions. He's certainly become assertive. He must be or he'll miss out. He wants to learn and he's very curious."

David's teachers at Associated, Orna Goldberg and Linda Kichler, spend time pre-teaching and repeating, as well as following-up on lessons, said Blum. "They've placed students next to him who are willing to answer his questions. Also, they've called if there have been any questions. Certainly, with a class of 30, that's a lot to do."

David took horseback riding lessons with the Community Association for Riding for the Disabled (CARD) at the age of 2, before he learned how to walk. With meningitis affecting his muscle tone and his co-ordination, he had to strengthen his muscles before he could walk. His mother said the incredible strength gained in his legs through riding enabled him to walk.

David's sister, Sara, 17, and eight girls from her high school, Ulpanat Orot, have been volunteering at CARD as horse leaders and side-walkers for the past two years.

With David in the family, Blum says her family has become aware of and more sensitive to the needs of the disabled. Everyone in the family, including Blum, has done or is doing some kind of volunteer work in the community. "Volunteering is a way of life for us."

Sister Leah, 19, a second year University of Toronto student, has been a volunteer with Senior Care for the past four years. After finishing her BA, she plans to go on to the School of Social Work.

Their brother Asher, 14, has volunteered at Baycrest, and sister Tova, 12, is involved with Extend-A-Family, an organization that integrates handicapped children into the community by matching them up with special friends.

She said David's progress has been a family effort and his brother and his sisters have all been involved, but she stressed that her son has worked hard to get where he is. "It wasn't just us. It was him too."

David, she said, is a miracle child.

CJC appointments

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Marvin Stark has been named to the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) national committee on constitutional and charter review, and Zena Simces Katz to the national committee on law and social action.

The appointments were announced this week by Renee Switzer Bellas, chair of the Pacific region of Congress.

Bellas says in a press release that the constitutional and charter review committee was formed under the chairmanship of Judge Maxwell Cohen of Montreal, with Irwin Cotler, Montreal, and John Laskin, Toronto, as associate chairs. Their task will be to initiate test case litigation on behalf of CJC, as well as determining when to intervene and at what level. In addition, the committee will have input when charter questions of importance to the Jewish community and other ethnocultural organizations arise.

She said the committee will also assist in the preparation of public education materials to promote better understanding of the Constitution and Charter of Rights and Freedom.

The law and social action committee will deal specifically with developments in Canada's social policies and articulate the concerns of the Jewish community on public policy issues.

Associated choir joins Tu b'Shevat festivities

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Despite hazardous ice and sleet conditions, more than 350 people showed up at the Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue to celebrate Tu b'Shevat on Jan. 27. The community celebration was part of week-long activities sponsored by the Jewish National Fund (JNF) of Toronto.

Getting the evening off to a festive start, the Associated Hebrew School's choir, under the direction of Yehudah Gilden, performed a medley of spirited songs honoring nature and the State of Israel.

Rabbi Joseph Kelman, spiritual leader of the synagogue, spoke on the significance of Tu b'Shevat and he read portions of a Tu b'Shevat seder with those in attendance participating in the readings. The choir participated in the rabbi's presentation.

"Today, we come together to reaffirm our bond with the land of Israel and rejoice in its rebirth," said Rabbi Kelman. "Tu b'Shevat, Rosh Hashanah La'ilanot marks the awakening of nature after its winter slumber. As we celebrate this seder, we renew our pledge to share in the rebuilding of Medinat Yisrael and make the desert bloom." The JNF, he said, which was established many, many years ago, "has made Israel a country of greenery — a land of milk and honey."

Tu b'Shevat, said the rabbi, teaches us one of the most fundamental lessons of Jewish life and life in general, "that what we do today could have beneficial results tomorrow, next year and years to come and that the planting of seeds and trees is an act of faith."

Patricia Alpert, the president of Toronto JNF, thanked JNF's Tu b'Shevat co-chairs, Barry Ganz and Brenda Cooper, and the staff and volunteers who helped make the celebrations a success.

The featured guest performer was Shelly Ovdat, an Israeli singer who has entertained at international congresses and conferences in Israel and represented Israel at international song festivals. Her repertoire, which reflected a mixture of cultures and traditions, included well-known Israeli and Yiddish folk songs. The audience, people of all ages, from two to 92, participated in the freilich sing-song bringing Jerusalem and Israel to the celebration.

Other Tu b'Shevat activities in the community sponsored by the JNF included a youth celebration at the Jewish Community Centre (JCC) North in conjunction with Zionist Youth Movements and JCC, a community telethon featured on the Zelda Young Show on radio, an Oneg Shabbat at Solel Congregation in Mississauga, celebrations at York, University of Toronto and Ryerson.

Slavens appointed president of Jerusalem Foundation board

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Businessman Paul Slavens was recently appointed president of the Toronto board of directors of the Jerusalem Foundation of Canada by Charles Bronfman, the honorary chair. The Foundation's Canadian head office is located in Montreal.

At an inaugural meeting at the Primrose Club in Toronto, Slavens told The CJN that as a result of the peace process, "Jerusalem, the eternal city, has taken on even more importance." He explained that the goal of the new Toronto board is to expand the Foundation's mission of improving Jerusalem's social, educational and cultural life.

For more than 25 years, Slavens has been actively involved in communal organizations including the United Jewish Appeal, State of Israel Bonds, Hebrew University, Mount Sinai Hospital, Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, and the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews.

Canadian architect Jack Diamond, who has designed many innovative buildings in North America, as well as the new City Hall in Jerusalem, was the guest of honor.

The Jerusalem Foundation was founded in 1966 by Teddy Kollek, the former mayor of Jerusalem. Slavens said that the Foundation has played a central role in the renaissance of Jerusalem. "Since its inception, the Foundation has successfully initiated more than 1,300 projects in Jerusalem, many of them ongoing — everything from beautification to community service, to culture and the preservation of Jerusalem's historical and religious sites, to the greening of Jerusalem and educational imperatives."

Manny Batshaw, the Foundation's national president, gave an overview of the activities of the Foundation. He said, "Jerusalem, because of its character and demography, is a poor city economically." He explained that Jerusalem has a low tax base since there is so little industry and its population is made up largely of civil servants, academics and religious functionaries, and the city was ravaged by wars and neglect.

"Jerusalem's beauty needed to be restored," said Batshaw. "Today, you literally can't walk anywhere in Jerusalem without being the beneficiary of some aspect of the work being done by the Foundation." He noted that the Hurva Synagogue in the Old Jewish Quarter, which was destroyed in the riots of 1948, the Damascus Gate restoration and the operation of a program within the Cultural Centre for Soviet Jews were funded by Canadian donors.

One of the newer projects, he added, is the Teddy Kollek stadium, a 1,200 seat stadium which will allow Jerusalem to host world class events.

"The Foundation is more than bricks and mortar," Batshaw said. "The Foundation's goal is to make life in Jerusalem better — better for those who have always lived there, for those who visit, and for those who are newly arrived."

He added that projects, such as Ein Yael — the living museum — create conditions where Jews and Arabs can live together side by side.

Slavens recognized the contributions of Miriam Isenberg, a transportation lawyer, who along with her clients, is donating a playground for handicapped children, and Ellie Korenblum and her family who have donated a parkette in memory of her father and donated seven sculptures done by both Israeli and new immigrant sculptors.

A recent CBC video with Adrienne Clarkson on Diamond's Jerusalem City Hall project was viewed. It describes the design and construction of the two new buildings, 11 old ones that have been restored and the sqaure designed for 15,000 people.

Diamond said that "one of the things that is so exceptional in a time of enormous stress and stringent and terribly tight means" is that Israelis aspire to create biblical parks and tennis courts "that will foster good relations between Arabs and Jews in poor districts." He praised those who have given their support "in the most exceptional way," adding he thinks "that making a great example of being good custodians augers well for a united and diverse Jerusalem."

Israeli Consul Dror Zeigerman thanked Diamond for his efforts in Jerusalem saying, "I understand he is going to continue some projects in Israel."

He said that one of the projects is a joint venture with Palestinian and Jewish investment and that Shimon Peres discussed the project with Yasser Arafat at their last meeting in Geneva. Zeigerman later told The CJN that this first project will be to build hospitals in the West Bank.

"Without the Jerusalem Foundation," said Zeigerman, "Jerusalem would not be united — and one of the most important aims is that Jerusalem will continue to be united and the capital of the State of Israel." He made a special presentation on behalf of the Foundation to Diamond for "his exceptional creative achievements and his dedication and love for Jerusalem."

Connie Putterman, co-chair with Glenn Gold of the New Leadership Group (NGL) of the Foundation, which was formed three years ago, spoke of the goals of the group which include fundraising, outreach to the Christian, Muslim and Jewish leaders and presenting social functions that will attract new young leadership. The NLG has raised more than $34,000 for a children's playground in a poor neighborhood in the west end of Jerusalem.

Torah, science exist in harmony, says Schroeder

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — If you find a conflict between science and Torah, you either don't understand science, or you don't understand Torah.

Maimonides made this statement in about 1160 CE, in his Guide for the Perplexed, and Dr. Gerald Schroeder devotes himself to proving, writing about and teaching the truth of this philosophy.

Few can be as eminently qualified as Schroeder, who received his PhD in oceanography and nuclear physics at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, taught and did research there, witnessed the detonation of atomic bombs, and, after making aliyah in 1971, researched and taught at the Weizmann Institute and the Volcani Institute.

Feeling he had, as he puts it, "paid his dues to science," he began to study Torah, with noted scholars Rabbi Herman Pollack and Rabbi Chaim Brovender, and at Aish HaTorah.

"I felt my main interest was no longer there [in science]. I was most interested in finding the harmony between science and Torah."

In 1992, he left the scientific community to teach and write full time. He is now associated with Aish HaTorah. He was in Toronto to lecture for Aish HaTorah, as well as to several day schools.

"We are so lucky to live now, when science is moving ahead so much. It is only in the past 60 years that scientific discoveries have forced science to move toward Torah."

The Torah, he said, describes in Genesis that creation occurred from nothing, and was marked by the beginning of time, space and matter.

It was only in the 1960s and 70s, he said, that using the laws of physics, especially Einstein's laws of relativity, the scientific world accepted the so-called Big Bang theory, a theory in essence that proves the biblical account of creation is true.

Nachmanides, Schroeder said, pointed out in 1260 CE that the account of the beginning of creation ends with "And there was evening, and there was morning, one day." Every other day was described in comparative terms, as the second day, the third day and so on.

"The term 'day one' is an absolute statement. It marked the creation of time. There is nothing to compare it to."

Life, according to the Torah, began on the third day of creation, immediately after the creation of water.

In the 1970s, Schroeder said, microfossils were discovered, the first fossil life. They showed scientifically that life, indeed, appeared immediately after water.

The key to understanding our calender, which seems at first glance to contradict the six days of creation talked about in the Torah, is to realize that the calender begins, not at the first day, but with the creation of Adam, near the end of the sixth day, and follows the generations of his descendents, bringing the Jewish calender to 5754, he said.

The previous nearly six days, Schroeder said, which correspond to "what every museum in the world calls pre-history," are "outside of time."

The Torah sages say each day of creation was 24 hours long. Einstein's law of relativity, Schroeder said, says that when you measure an event of time, the amount of time you experience depends on the gravity and velocity of your location relative to where you are observing the event.

In other words, you measure time according to where you are in the universe.

The six days before Adam, he said, couldn't be six days of earth time, "because there was no earth yet" and the only valid calculation would be one that embraces the whole cosmos.

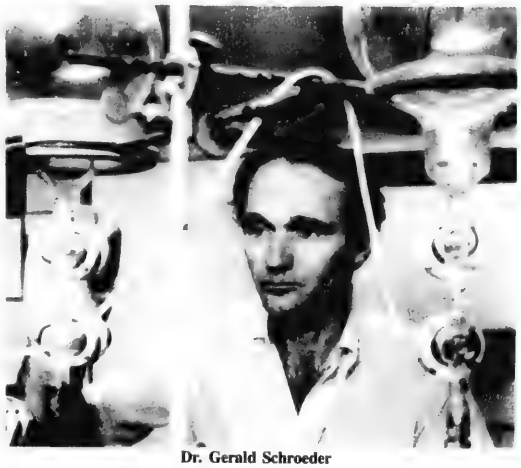
According to the laws of physics, Schroeder said, the clock that operates under the influence of the whole universe would tick so slowly that in the time it would record six 24-hour days of cosmic time, earth would experience 16 billion years.

The book of Psalms recognizes this, Schroeder said, quoting Psalm 90, verse 4, where G-d says "For a thousand years in thy sight are but like yesterday when it is past."

The creation of Adam and Eve, coincides with the beginning of writing, the beginning of commerce and the development of cities.

Writing began, according to archeological findings, in the city of Urk in Mesopotamia, between 5,000 and 6,000 years ago. The first writing, Schroeder said, dealt with commerce, which was necessary because of the division of labor that came about between those who lived in the cities and those who lived in the country.

And why did big cities appear just then? Schroeder has what he admits is his own theory — that with the appearance of the neshama, the soul that G-d gave to Adam and Eve, creatures became human, and in their humanity wanted human contact.



Dr. Gerald Schroeder

Schroeder flatly denies fundamentalist claims that dinosaurs couldn't have existed because they do not fit into the six days of creation.

In the first place, the 16 billion years that stretched before the creation of man left plenty of time for other creatures, he said.

But even more to the point, Genesis 1:21 says that G-d created hataninim hagedolim (great animals).

But Exodus describes how Moses' stick, when he threw it before Pharoh, became a tanin. Five verses later, when G-d retells the story, He used the word nahash for the stick. Nahash, says Schroeder, means snake, and since the two words are obviously tied together, the taninim referred to both here and in Genesis must mean reptile.

And what were dinosaurs but huge reptiles?

Schroeder's book, Genesis and the Big Bang: The Discovery of Harmony Between Modern Science and the Bible, was published in 1990 by Bantam Books.

Chocolate Sunday draws record Victoria crowd

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VICTORIA — A record-breaking 5,500 (for Victoria) people were on hand for Hadassah-WIZO's third annual Chocolate Sunday, held recently in the Conference Centre here.

Some of those attending lined up for as much as an hour to get into the event, at $5 per person, which included a wide variety of samples from various chocolate manufacturers.

Actually, Chocolate Sunday was a three-day affair, opening on Friday with a display of chocolate sculptures at the Empress Hotel done by some of the city's leading sculptors. The sculptures were auctioned off the next night at a gala dinner at the Empress attended by 250. Dinner tickets were $85 per person.

The gala dinner menu featured seven courses, all with chocolate in one form or another. Los Angeles La Patina chef, Bruno Feldstein, supervised preparation of the meal.

Another feature was the appearance of Toronto actor Al Waxman as master of ceremonies at the dinner. Waxman, who attended shul on the Shabbat morning, said Hadassah-WIZO is a "worthwhile" charity and he was pleased to make the special trip here to participate in the event. He was supposed to have stayed over until Monday night to speak at a meeting at the Jewish Community Centre but had to get back to Toronto because he was in the midst of shooting a Paramount movie, Once a Cop.

Waxman said he has been in show biz for over 40 years and told a Times-Colonist reporter that "if I'm still in this business when I get to 62 (he's 58 now) I've been doing it for 50 years. That would be nice."

Choosing Village Park Was A Family Decision

When we acquired Village Park we never imagined our own mother would move in. But after our father passed away we knew our mother couldn't live alone anymore. She needed round-the-clock supervision and nursing assistance. So we had a family meeting and decided to bring mom to Village Park. The nursing staff are wonderful and friendly, and the care is customized so each resident's needs are met. We're glad mother's at Village Park, and she's happy here. That's the most important thing.

Israeli organization helps country's neediest families

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

After all, delivering over 25,000 babies is no mean feat.

But Chalkowski, nicknamed Bambi, from her maiden name of Bamberger, spends considerable time with her other love, Besiyua Mishpachot Beruchot Yeladim, called BAMBI for short, an organization that raises money to help some of Israel's neediest families.

In Toronto as part of a North American fundraising tour, Chalkowski told The CJN that during the Yom Kippur War, people from Lucerne called and asked her how they could help Israel in its time of trial.

"I told them that there were families who, for many different reasons, needed help, and they should raise money for that. I also told them that once they started, they shouldn't stop when the war ends."

The enterprise began in a small way, with three needy families receiving $100 (US) a month. The original supporters brought in people from other cities in Switzerland, from Belgium, Italy and England, and other European cities.

A few years later, when the list of families being helped had risen to 40, Rabbi Eli Munk, a noted scholar, suggested the organization become more official, and BAMBI, named in Chalkowski's honor (the full name was derived from the acronym, not the other way around) was incorporated as a non-profit charity organization.

(CJN readers may remember an article about Rabbi Munk's activities in England during World War II, when his home in London became a way station for young Jewish girls being smuggled out of Germany to America).

The organization spread throughout Europe, and, 12 years ago, came to the United States and Canada.

BAMBI raises funds by holding parlor meetings once or twice a year in such cities as Lakewood, Brooklyn, Los Angeles, Chicago, Miami, Toronto and Montreal.

Montreal BAMBI has a unique way to collect money. Girls from the local Beth Jacob and Belz high schools canvas given streets every Rosh Chodesh.

"These girls raise nearly $1,000 a month for us," Chalkowski said.

Some 450 families are now helped by the organization. But the recipients don't necessarily remain the same.

Many have managed quite well on their own, until a catastrophic illness or family situation hits. A mother may be ill and the family needs help hired help, a child may be ill and the medical bills are horrific, a father may lose his job.

Others remain for a very long time, like when someone in the family has a chronic debilitating illness or condition.

Social service agencies or school social workers are often the referring body. Chalkowski explained that there is always a liaison person, who explains the need and indicates when the family situation has returned to normal.

This liaison, Chalkowski said, may also recommend that instead of a straight gift of cash, the family would be better served by purchases of food or having their bills paid directly.

There is a waiting list for BAMBI's help, and Chalkowski says the need is growing, with more people in real poverty.

"Social services are very low, there are many new immigrants, some are poor for the second generation, there are widows, widowers, divorced, one-parent families."

BAMBI in Canada is a tax-deductable charity.

Earthquake fund launched

NEW YORK — As an immediate response to the devastating earthquake that struck Los Angeles Monday, the Council of Jewish Federation has established the CJF Earthquake Emergency Fund.

As information arrives from Los Angeles about the extent of the damage and short and long-term needs, additional action will be considered, said CJF president Maynard Wishner.

In response to other natural disasters, in the past year CJF has established the CJF Miami Hurricane Relief Fund and the CJF Midwest Flood Relief Fund.

On her return to Israel, she spent two years as a lecturer and researcher at the Hebrew University. There she met her second husband, the English engineering consultant Alexander Himsley. They were married in Israel in 1957. The family came to Canada where Alex worked on uranium mine projects. He died of cancer six years ago.

After their arrival in Canada, Farkas-Himsley took a position at the University of Toronto on the advice of Charles Best, Nobel laureate for his discovery of insulin. She began researching the effect of bacteriocins — a protein produced by bacteria — on viral-infected cells. These proteins, called anti-cancer proteins (ACP), can also be used to diagnose cancer in its early stages.

Farkas-Himsley worked with researchers at the Princess Margaret Hospital, the Hospital for Sick Children, the Mount Sinai Hospital and Women's College Hospital in Toronto, and with the Weizmann Institute and the Hadassah Medical Centre in Israel.

Farkas-Himsley is survived by her daughters who live in Jerusalem; Leorah Kroyanker, a museum curator married to David Kroyanker; Ruth Geva, a criminologist married to Yehuda Geva; and four grandchildren, Eyal (who is in the Israeli army) and Sharon Kroyanker, and Tamar and Michal Geva.

To perpetuate her memory and her accomplishments in the field of microbiology, family and friends have established the Hannah Farkas-Himsley Fund in the Department at the University of Toronto.

Sportsman Ungerman enjoys helping kids

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Irving Ungerman remembers the moment well. It was 1965, the scene was Madison Square Garden and his protégé, the Great White Hope from Canada, George Chuvalo, was about to square off against Floyd Patterson in a fight card for the ages.

On the line was the WBA heavyweight championship and a capacity crowd was on hand to witness the event.

Ungerman, Chuvalo's manager, was standing in his fighter's corner participating in the pre-fight hoopla that he could barely have imagined when as a scrawny kid in Toronto's Junction area he put on his first pair of boxing gloves.

A who's who of boxing greats including Jack Dempsey, Joe Louis, Tony Galento, Rocky Marciano and Sugar Ray Robinson all entered the ring, greeted the fighters and their managers and acknowledged the appreciative crowd.

For Ungerman, it was the ultimate sporting dream come true, meeting the idols he had followed for many years. Unfortunately, the second part of the evening — the bout itself — wasn't so successful. Although he was tough as nails and could take a punch, Chuvalo couldn't defeat Patterson.

While Ungerman counts that night as the pinnacle of his involvement in the fight game, these days he's much more likely to change the conversation's direction and point to his involvement in charitable causes as giving him the greatest satisfaction.

A longtime supporter of the Reena Foundation, Mount Sinai Hospital, Maccabi Canada, the Salvation Army and even the Santa Claus Parade, Ungerman says helping youth and giving something back to the community are an ingrained part of his character.

It's something he got from his father, Isaac, who used to say (in Yiddish) that you've got to do things while you're alive, Ungerman said. "He was a very charitable man," he continued, providing food from his poultry business even when people couldn't pay for it.

Ungerman, 71, believes he is continuing that family tradition today and he has developed a reputation as a can-do guy whose ability to promote a cause and raise funds can help charitable institutions thrive.

About 12 years ago, he responded for a call to help the Santa Claus Parade and he remains a key part of the volunteer corps which makes each year's event a success.

He has helped the Reena Foundation, he says, "because it's kids, the mentally handicapped;" his synagogue, the Beth Sholom; the Shaare Zedek Hospital in Israel; the Salvation Army; and, of course, Maccabi Canada have all been the beneficiaries of Ungerman's efforts.

The Maccabi organization has a spot near and dear to his heart, he readily acknowledges. He's been involved with the Jewish sporting organization since Alex Fisher brought him on board as a fundraiser in 1969 and he's attended every one of the quadrennial games since then.

"I believe in Israel," Ungerman says. "I'm a proud Jewish boy and if I can help any kid. . . get closer to Israel, I'll do it."

Although nowadays Jewish youngsters interested in sports have many outlets for their energy, when he was growing up things were a lot different.

After the family (which included five boys and two girls) moved from Kensington to the Junction in 1934, Ungerman found himself in a tough neighborhood whose young residents didn't always take kindly to Jews.

He recalls a soccer game in which an anti-Semitic youth kicked him on the shins when the ball was nowhere in sight and he remembers being hit on the head with school books by other kids. That sort of treatment prompted him to take up boxing at the Carlton Central Y.

Ungerman says he enjoyed being in the ring "because I felt I didn't want to get pushed around. I was forced to stand up to the guys."

In 1939 at age 17, Ungerman won the city championship as a scrawny but scrappy 105-pounder.

During his six years in the Air Force during World War II, he continued to box and was known as Kid Ungy (one contemporary ad referred to him and other boxers as "mitt-slingers").

When he was discharged in 1945 he joined his father in the poultry business and helped build it up into a substantial wholesale/retail enterprise in the city's west end.

Irving Ungerman

It was thanks to poultry that Ungerman met that eventual pug, Chuvalo. But when he first saw him, Chuvalo was a harmless child in a carriage whose mother worked in the Ungerman's poultry plant.

In 1962, when Chuvalo was still a young fighter, Ungerman became his manager and began setting up matches for the up-and-coming star. After he won a major bout against Doug Jones, the number two contender at the time, Chuvalo entered the big time.

Ungerman's big break came when he co-operated with promoter Bob Arum to book a Cassius Clay (later, Muhammad Ali) and Ernie Terrell fight at Maple Leaf Gardens. But because Ali was being blackballed for his stand against the Vietnam War, Terrell backed down and Ungerman got Chuvalo to take his place.

It was a memorable fight in which Chuvalo went 12 rounds with the champ, but lost. Both fighters took a beating and when it was all over, Ali said he couldn't believe Chuvalo was still standing.

Since that time, Ungerman's ties with Arum have paid off handsomely as he has repeatedly obtained the rights to present closed circuit fights in Canada.

Nevertheless, Ungerman admits he's become disillusioned with the fight game today. It's not the sport it used to be — there aren't the big names like Ali, Frazier and Norton fighting anymore, and some prominent U.S. promoters are harming the sport's image.

While Ungerman is best known for his involvement in the manly art of pugilism — he was recently named to the Jewish Sports Hall of Fame — he says "there are two sides to my life. They think I'm a rough and tough boxer but there's a sentimental side to me too. I've collected art since I was into boxing."

Nevertheless, for most people who've followed the world of sport, its Ungerman's involvement in the fight game combined with his interest in Maccabi that spring most readily to mind. And the man who has accompanied the Maccabiah team to Israel repeatedly in the last 24 years is looking forward to this summer when he will again make the trip to the Jewish state where he will be inducted into the prestigious hall of fame.

Israeli hockey players to train in Andorra

TORONTO — Andorra is the land of snow-capped mountains, lush valleys, picturesque villages and, of course, rink rats.

If the tiny Principality of Andorra, situated in the Pyrenees Mountains between France and Spain, does not strike anyone as a hockey mecca, the Israeli national team is planning to erase that impression.

The boys in blue and white are planning an eight-day training camp in Andorra in early March, just before they head south to Barcelona to participate in the International Ice Hockey Federation Division C championships. There, they will take to the ice against teams from South Africa, Australia, Spain and Belgium in the hopes of improving their dismal showing at last year's tournament in Bled, Slovenia.

Changes in the tournament format mean that Israel (and other hockey lesser-lights) will not have to take on pro outfits iced by Latvia, Ukraine and Kazakhstan as they did last year.

Furthermore, head coach Gideon Lee is hoping that the Slovenia shellacking will serve as "a wake up call" to the team and prod them into coming to the tournament in better shape and with a business-like attitude.

Lee, who recently returned from evaluation camps in Israel, said he expects this year's edition of the national team to be be somewhat better than last year's model, which didn't win a game. Goaltending should be stronger with the addition of an oleh who used to play Junior A hockey in the Soviet Union, while Ward Parson, a native of Vancouver who holds an Israeli passport, is expected to join the team as well.

Overall, however, it should be the same cast of characters that competed in Bled, but with the expectation that they will boost their level of play. The Israeli-based players have been given an exercise program that they are expected to follow and they are practising twice a week.

Lee said the team will benefit from financial allocations from Israel's sports lottery but the team is still operating on a shoestring. It is badly in need of equipment, particularly shoulder and elbow pads, blue helmets, gloves, a goalie mask, sticks and even two pairs of skates.

A bagel is a bagel is a bagel, right? Wrong! As any bagel lover will tell you, some bagels are chewier than others, moister than others, sweeter than others, or just plain better than others – good enough, in their opinion, to travel a little further for.

After seven years of baking Montreal-style bagels in Thornhill, St-Urbain Bagel Bakery has recently expanded to open a new shop at 895 Eglinton Avenue West, just west of Bathurst. This is good news for both Montrealers craving a taste of home and Torontonians who have grown to love the chewy, sweet bagels.

Owners Bernie Good and Eric Bailis (Good hails from Ottawa, Bailis is from Montreal) met several years ago while working in an accounting office. They decided to go into business together and bought the existing Thornhill Bakery. They expanded the bakery's selection to include a fridge full of lox, cheeses and spreads to top their bagels.

Bagels hand-rolled and baked in wood-burning oven

What makes Montreal-style bagels different from Toronto bagels? The recipe is low sodium; there is no salt in them. The bagels are all hand-rolled, then boiled in water with a bit of honey. According to Good, this "gives a nice shine and a little bit of sweetness to them." The bagels are then baked in a large wood-burning brick oven.

The reasons why Montreal-style bagels seem to have become indigenous to Montreal are unknown. Possibly years ago, the laws against wood-burning stoves in Toronto were stricter. Whatever the reason, a definite bagel culture has evolved that is unique to each city. People tend to be quite opinionated about their preferred bagels. Good observes that "for a lot of ex-Montrealers [the shop] brings back a lot of memories of Saturday night at the bagel shop."

The Eglinton shops has a selection of sandwiches and coffee to go, in addition to salmon spreads and cheeses. This shop is the third location for St-Urbain; their second location opened in the St. Lawrence Market two years ago.

Their variety of bagels has something for everyone. It includes plain, poppy, sesame, cinnamon raisin, whole wheat, 7-grain, pumpernickel and onion. In addition to bagels, they have a selection of breads and rolls, such as challah, 7-grain bread, whole wheat bread and onion rolls. Knishes are another delicious specialty, with potato, mushroom and pizza rounding out the menu. For those with a sweet tooth, there are tempting cheese bagelach, danishes and cakes.

The Eglinton store hours are Monday to Friday, 7 a.m. to 6:30 p.m., Saturday and Sunday, 7 a.m. to 5:30 p.m.

Perkins & Pape, at 365 Eglinton Ave. W. is changing the way people shop for furniture. This beautiful shop lets customers browse through a wide selection of catalogues and choose from an extensive array of fine-quality home furnishings by many of the world's top manufacturers — all at significant savings.

With a wide range of styles, from traditional to contemporary, and with furniture for every room in the house, including the home office and even the patio, Perkins & Pape has something to suit everyone's taste and lifestyle.

Over 60 manufacturers are represented in the in-store catalogues which means customers have the opportunity to order exactly what they want in the color, finish and fabrics of their choice, rather than having to take whatever is in stock.

The shop itself is a delight to browse through. The floor samples are carefully selected to demonstrate the quality and workmanship of the lines carried, and represent the eclectic tastes of owners Joan Pape Cohen and Nancy Perkins. Such items as overstuffed, slipcovered sofas and chairs, reproduction mahogany pieces, custom-painted pine furniture in styles ranging from rustic to country and Italian, and wrought iron chairs, tables and beds either made by the manufacturer in a choice of colors, or custom-made by artisans, are sure to please even the most discriminating tastes.

Cohen and Perkins know the importance of accessories, and items like lush chenille throws in plaids and solids, damask-covered boxes in three sizes, fabulous lamps and unique throw pillows add just the right detail to any room. "Not only does Perkins & Pape save customers time by allowing them to see a wide range of products in one visit, but we also help them save money because our prices are substantially lower than larger furniture stores that have major showroom and warehouse costs to cover," says Cohen.

In-home designing

Perkins adds that "we know that fine-furniture shoppers today refuse to lower expectations of quality, yet they are shopping smarter in order to lower their expenditures. We have no vested interest in customers buying anything other than exactly the color, style or fabric that they want. Shoppers no longer have to wait for sales to get the best buy. Our prices are great every day on every item."

New to Perkins & Pape is an in-home design service. For a modest fee, which is refundable with the first purchase, a designer will come to your home to help either with the selection and placement of new furniture or to update the look already in the home.

You won't need to take a seat before we tell you the price.

When you find the furniture you've been searching for, our prices won't make you go weak at the knees. Not that we would describe our merchandise as cheap. It isn't – but we do sell fine quality furniture for less simply because we're not a large store and our overhead is low.

Nor do we expect you to sacrifice selection for savings. We offer elegant traditional and contemporary furniture equal to stores many times larger and if we don't have the piece you're looking for on the floor, you're sure to find it in our extensive selection of catalogues.

So whether you're looking for a sofa, a baker's rack, or even a chair, rest assured you'll be sitting pretty.

The name "Hudson's Bay Company" evokes romantic images of a bygone era and a company that satisfied its clients' demands through thick and thin. (Often in subzero temperatures!)

Gone are the fur traders, but the romantic appeal and the desire to please live on in Hudson's Bay Catering. For 44 years, this division of The Bay has quietly prepared fabulous receptions for weddings, bar and bat mitzvahs in one of the most breathtaking settings anywhere.

Spectacular setting

The main dining hall is, quite simply, remarkable. Sculptured 48-foot ceilings tower over the beige-and-earth-toned tile floor. Four massive skylights (each 20' x 20') leave the entire room bathed in natural light. (Which is good news for the dozen or so natural palm trees dotting the dining room floor!) Four majestic chandeliers supply ample lighting when the sun sets.

The room is skirted by massive Roman columns and banked with exquisite semicircular enclaves which, together with the central seating arrangements, allow the room to accommodate 1,000 people comfortably. Yet a party of 20 can dine intimately (you have to see it!).

Built in 1929 and renovated in 1987, the dining hall spans two floors of the old Bay building on Queen street.

A spectacular setting demands equally spectacular cuisine, and HBC delivers with exquisite and eclectic menus prepared by highly skilled chefs from all culinary backgrounds. Delightful surprises abound. For example, a standard 7-course meal offers cream of watercress with pecans, bibb and endive salad with balsamic vinaigrette, rosettes of veal in a light peppercorn sauce, parisienne potatoes, asparagus tips & roast red pepper strips, chocolate tiramisu, tea and coffee for only $38. Another selection consists of mushroom & vermouth soup, spinach salad with pine nuts, rock cornish game hen, wild rice, medley of fresh vegetables, raspberry sherbert, tea and coffee for only $30.95.

Custom menu requests are always welcome and will be expertly accommodated.

From traditional dishes through fabulous fresh desserts and pastries prepared on the premises, you and your guests will enjoy the fruits of the chefs' expertise. Even the hors d'oeuvres–an afterthought at many functions–are special enough to have generated a demand in their own right.

Competitive prices

With the magnificent setting and fine cuisine, you might expect to pay more. But prices are "competitive – and of course there's the "comfort zone" of dealing with The Bay," says Catering Manager Robert Dearing.

If the fur trappers and tradespeople of yesteryear could attend a modern-day HBC function, they'd undoubtedly be dazzled. But not surprised – after all, they'd say, "it is the Hudson's Bay Company."

Hank's new facilities make for a fabulous affair

When the new ballroom at Hank's Diner opens in March, the hall will be able to accomodate every type of party from casual to the most formal events.

Hank's has always catered parties, but with the new facilities, they will be able to serve a minimum of 40 up to a maximum of 250 people and will be well prepared to turn out a fabulous affair for a wedding, bar/bat mitzvah, engagement, anniversary, special birthday or any other reason the hosts can dream up.

When clients come to Hank's to book a party, they are assured of good service, fabulous food and the professional advice necessary for an A1 event. Theme parties are their specialty, and owner Peter Andreakos and his professional staff can help turn out delightful parties with such themes as baseball, hockey, Star Trek or western. "We did a 40th birthday party that had everyone come in costume. It was terrific," says Peter.

He says kids are thrilled when they come into a baseball party and receive a baseball cap, T-shirt or boxer shorts as a souvenir. "We help arrange everything from the decorations and party favors to the disc jockeys."

When it comes to the food, Peter is an expert. He knows kids love finger foods and with that in mind, he offers an array of appetizers such as chicken fingers, chicken wings, spring rolls, cold cuts and meat balls. A vegetarian menu could consist of pizza, vegetable-and-cheese lasagna, caesar salad, garlic bread and veggie trays. Hosts have a choice of a sit-down dinner or a buffet and those who wish can bring in individual kosher meals.

Desserts are not forgotten at Hank's and most buffets contain luscious cheesecakes, delicious chocolate cakes and mouth-watering fruit trays and ice cream. If the hosts desire a specialty cake, the staff can recommend a bakery.

"For more formal events we make everything from fish to pasta to gourmet beef and chicken dishes, various desserts and try to accommodate most requests. We really are very flexible when it comes to our menu. We also assure our hosts that they will never run out of food. We offer a set price and everything is unlimited from the food to the drinks. We prepare food until every guest has had enough."

Peter says his parties have always been such a success that most people come in on referrals. He gets about five calls a day and already has bookings for 1995.

"Not only are the parties fun and the food good, but hosts like the fact that functions at Hank's are strictly private. The restaurant is closed on weekends so when a party is on, the whole place is 100 per cent their own."

In addition to affairs at the hall, Hank's also does at-home catering and has lunch service at the diner. A cocktail party at home could include spring rolls, spinach-and-cheese pies, stuffed mushroom caps, meatballs or party sandwiches. "Again, we are very flexible. People just have to give us a call, and we can get together and discuss the budget and type of food requested. We do everything we can to give the best party possible."

LEVI'S

Want a pair of Levi's or a great spring skirt from Mexx? Don't want your savings to melt away like the winter snow? Take a walk on the UNIQUE side and see how low prices can go!

Brand names at no-name prices

rock-bottom prices, the UNIQUE STOCKROOM boasts deals galore for spring. But major domo Derek Rea promises to take that philosophy one step further with prices so small you'll need a magnifying glass to see them. No – a microscope!

We get the picture, Derek. On a more serious note, Rea points out that Unique has "worked hard to become known as a store where you can shop for brand names without cringing. When we say we're going to offer low prices, we offer them; we're not just paying lip service. When you talk the talk, you gotta walk the walk."

And what better way to "walk it" than in a pair of world-famous Levi's 501s (for men and women) from $36.98, or a Request body suit at $19.98? And why pay $35 for Levi's' cotton docker shirts when you can pick them up at UNIQUE for only $15.98?

As the evenings heat up, men will look great and stay cool in cool wool blazers from Elfino from only $99.98, while the ladies will draw oohs and aahs with their Mexx dressy skirts at only $39.98 (reg. $105).

The UNIQUE spring hit list goes on and on. Men can enjoy the superb quality of Mexx shirts in assorted prints and styles for only $29.99. For ladies, President Stone boxer shorts are only $7.98 (reg. $20). For men, Levi's henley tops are available in assorted colours for a sportsmanlike price of $9.98. For men and ladies, Levi's T-shirts are "priced to sell", and of course there's the ever-popular UNIQUE pure cotton T-shirts and tanks in a rainbow of fashion colours at only $6 and $5 respectively. There's also a brand new signature UNIQUE fashion T-shirt that's moving briskly at $7.

UNIQUE ESPRIT EUROPE

Westcoast Connection: student travel at its best

Westcoast Connection Travel Camp began 12 years ago with a group of 40 Montreal and Toronto teenagers on a six-week tour of California and Western Canada.

Since then the word has spread throughout Canada and the United States of this unique and exciting experience of active student travel with the opportunity of discovering new and fascinating places throughout North America and Europe.

Today Westcoast Connection offers a wide selection of programs for students aged 13 to 17 in addition to their On Tour division for those 17 to 22 years of age. Students now travel with others from Canada, the United States and Europe.

What hasn't changed is Westcoast Connection's committment to their original philosophy of "each and every" individual tour member having the very best summer of their life as an integral member of a tightly knit tour group.

Westcoast provides a diverse selection of the very best student travel itineraries from active teen tours to cycling trips for all abilities to the challenging outdoor adventure programs.

Regardless of which style of trip, whether three weeks to six, whether domestic or foreign, you will experience the natural wonders of the great outdoors, the sights and sounds of the big cities, and the leadership of the most caring and capable staff and guides in the camp industry.

Active Teen Tours

North American tours feature summer skiing in Whistler, whitewater rafting in Colorado, horseback riding in Wyoming, and dunebuggying on the Oregon Sand Dunes in addition to visits to Yellowstone National Park, Mount Rushmore, The Badlands, Grand Canyon, Bryce Canyon and entertainment varying from Disneyland, rock concerts, comedy clubs, and the Calgary Stampede to camp-style sports and programming — important ingredients which help to make the tour group of 40 one big happy family.

European tours are offered as well.

North Amercian Cycling Tours

North American Cycling tours made up of groups of 18 students traverse through beautiful green mountains and winding country trails of Vermont and Massachusetts and along the scenic Pacific coast of Washington, Oregon and California. More than just cycling tours — there's whitewater rafting, deepsea fishing, a river safari, summer skiing and three day visits to such cities as San Francisco, Seattle, and Boston. Westcoast cycling tours are for beginner cyclists — anyone can do it!

European Cycling Tours

The European Cycling tours bring cyclists through the lush Loire Valley to wine tasting in local vineyards and Da'Vinci's collection. In Paris, cruise down the River Seine, stroll along Champs Elysees, tour the Louvre, spend the day at Euro-Disney. On the Riviera it's windsurfing and some R&R, The Chagall Museum, Antibes amusement park and it's onto summer skiing in Tigne Val D'isere.

These cycling programs are being offered to college-age students as well.

Outdoor Adventure Tours

New this year is the Outdoor Adventure Tour of Western Canada featuring summer skiing in Whistler, rockclimbing school in British Columbia, hiking in the Canadian Rockies, kayaking in Kamloops, horseback riding in Alberta, mountain biking and much more for someone looking for a real challenge in the great outdoors.

Hadassah-WIZO: one try and you're hooked

Once a woman joins Hadassah-WIZO, she is hooked for life, a Toronto Hadassah-WIZO official says.

Membership chair Ruth Garbe asks where else can a woman have tremendous fun with some of the most capable, dynamic women in Toronto and at the same time make a contribution to Israel? All 3,500 members in 72 chapters enjoy this duality.

Like many family businesses, Toronto Hadassah-WIZO thrives on new blood to keep it vital, viable and visible.

It's for this reason that the organization is continually attracting women of all ages.

R. Garbe

"We are planning a wonderful spring membership event for prospective new members. One of our target groups is women in their 20s and 30s who are daughters and daughters-in-law of members," says Garbe.

Garbe says members are happy and fulfilled. They find personal growth through participation in fundraising events and leadership workshops. Friendships established often last a lifetime.

Is this truth or fiction?

Just ask Natalie Rashkovan. In her 20s, she is married and pregnant with her first child due in February. She is also president of Lev Zahav Chapter, a 3-year-old chapter which boasts 40 members all under the age of 30. Another unique feature is that it is evenly split between Torontonians and ex-Montrealers like Rashkovan and the friend with whom she first joined 2½ years ago.

N. Rashkovan

Rashkovan, employed at Baycrest Centre, joined the organization as a newcomer to Toronto primarily to socialize but says she has always been involved in the Jewish community.

"My parents planted within me the need to give back to the community. This has been part of my personal development. Hadassah-WIZO has fulfilled many of my needs including leadership skills. It enriches my life. It's almost like a second family and gives me a sense of belonging. I like it that this organization gives to Israel.

"Hadassah-WIZO is a rewarding experience for me. I don't think I could get more out of any other organization."

Ample proof that Hadassah-WIZO delivers on its commitment to help a woman grow and develop to her potential.

Kosher doesn't cost more at the Wok 'N Deli

People who insist on keeping kosher are accustomed to paying more for their food, and are more than willing to make this small sacrifice. In the Jewish community at large, however, there are many who don't necessarily keep kosher and would like to dine at a kosher restaurant but are deterred by the cost.

New window of opportunity to try kosher dining

The recently opened and instantly popular Wok 'N Deli Glatt Kosher Restaurant at 441 Clark Avenue West in Thornhill has provided these people with a new window of opportunity. Unlike other glatt kosher restaurants whose prices would be considered high by regular restaurant standards, the Wok 'N Deli offers many exciting dishes whose prices compare favourably with those of any restaurant.

The purpose, says partner Malcolm Manricks, is twofold. "First of all, we rejected the premise that glatt kosher has to cost substantially more. My partners and I felt that if we offered the community the best of everything at reasonable prices, our volume would more than offset the shortfall in menu prices. The response to date has proved us right."

Second of all, he says, "though our main clientele is the kosher community, we wanted to allow those who don't normally keep kosher to try kosher dining. The old excuse that kosher restaurants are too expensive is not valid here."

A perusal of the menu certainly bears out his claim. The Chicken Avocado Club, a deli favourite, is a meal in itself at only $5.95. The Wok 'N Deli Burger, another popular item, goes for $6.95. (Both are served with fries). If pasta is your preference, try the succulent Fettucine Primavera served with julienne of zucchini, broccoli, and cauliflower in a fresh herbal sauce for only $8.25. From the Wok, an Oriental Pepper Steak goes down nicely at $5.50, as does the spicy Hunan Beef with chinese mushrooms at $5.95. For dessert, the Chocolate Kahlua Cake with hazelnut cream at $3.25 is so addictively good you'll probably ask to have it taken off the menu for your own protection – after you've been sure to order the last piece, of course.

Manricks and his partners, Rabbi A. J. Eisenberger, Mendy Goldman and Joe Elmaleh, also own and operate Regal Kosher Caterers at 3710 Chesswood Drive. Since its inception in September, Regal has gained a reputation as a glatt kosher caterer of choice for weddings, bar mitzvahs, and other special occasions.

Decor-wise, the Wok 'N Deli has received raves for its art deco dining room and unique neon-ringed ceiling. Highly colourful yet dignified, it's fun for the kids and pleasant for adults.

Speaking of kids, children 10 and under can order a junior burger, crispy chicken wings, corned beef sandwich, jumbo hot dog, or chicken fingers with fries and a soft drink for only $2.99. That's the kind of pricing that allows the whole family to dine out together. What better way to enjoy the kosher experience?

Meeting targets protection for health care pros

PRISM Publishing is headed by Laurie-Anne Jones, Barry Seltzer, Erwin Seltzer and Dr. Jerry Naiberg. The company was extended in 1991 as a publisher of books, tapes and cassettes, most of which were educational, for people in the legal and real estate professions.

Barry is the vice-president of Toronto Men's ORT, and both a Board Member and legal advisor of Canadian ORT. Besides an extensive background in law, he has experience in preparing educational conferences. He also does the Law Show for Rogers Cable, whose purpose is to demystify legal issues by presenting them in a way the public can enjoy and understand. Ms. Jones has a background in health sciences and medical education, and in organizing conferences in North America. In 1992, her skills were used to set up an independent branch of PRISM exclusively to organize seminars for professionals.

PRISM Publishing is promoting an interdisciplinary conference on the new Regulated Health Professions Act, or RHP, which the Ontario Legislature passed in December 1993. This new Act will dramatically affect not only Physicians, but Dentists and other Health Care professionals as well. The conference highlights how doctors and dentists can protect themselves in a new, more regulated working environment.

This event is a chance to combine a conference with a vacation. It will take place March 14 - March 18, at the MARRIOTT World Centre in Orlando, Florida, about one mile from Disneyworld. The seminar fee is an inexpensive $299.00 U.S., which is also tax deductible. Hotel rates include two bedrooms of more than 1,000 square feet for $155.00 U.S. per night. Discounted passes and shuttle bus transportation are available for DisneyWorld, Universal Studios, Seaworld/Busch Gardens and Wet 'N Wild. The Orlando event will be annual, with plans already in the works for 1995.

The Baron Strikes Gold ... Again

"Good as Gold." Baron Herzog's California wines are enjoying a banner year as the line's top varietals continue to earn numerous medals at national and international competitions.

Baron Herzog Sauvignon Blanc 1991 and Herzog Late Harvest Johannesburg Riesling 1991 won gold medals at the World Wine Championships, the largest wine competition in the world. The Riesling also earned silver medals at several national competitions including the Los Angeles County Fair and the Atlanta Wine Summit.

Other top varietals include Baron Herzog Chenin Blanc 1992, a gold medal winner at the San Diego National Wine Competition and Baron Herzog White Zinfandel 1991, honoured with numerous medals from the Taster's Guild International, Reno Wine Competition and Atlanta International Food and Wine Festival.

"Baron Herzog's achievements at these high-level competitions proves once again how consumers and wine connoisseurs are recognizing the superior quality and taste of Baron Herzog wines," said Jay Buchsbaum, the company's vice-president of marketing. "We forsee continued dynamic growth for the Baron Herzog line."

Baron Herzog wines have been repeatedly honoured at national and international wine competitions. This is the flagship brand of the Royal Wine Corporation's growing line of varietals.

By BILL GLADSTONE

Leo Desrochers, president of Sunquest Vacations Ltd., sounded exuberant at a recent press conference about the possibilities of selling Israel as a destination to Canadian travellers. "I believe that we in this company are on the threshold of something big and exciting," he said.

"The current peace negotiations, the new links to the Vatican — these are things that are going to give tourists tremendous confidence in Israel."

One of Canada's leading tour companies, Sunquest has been in business 22 years. Costs of its competitive packages to the British Isles and Europe are reduced by flying its own aircraft across the pond. About a decade ago, the company introduced packages to Ireland, a country then considered "off the tourist map" for most Canadians. Its success in luring Canadians there, as well as to Las Vegas, has shown company execs that championing lesser-travelled destinations that possess the right stuff can pay off royally. "Volume drives price," says Desrochers in explaining the company's proven formula for success.

In 1992, Sunquest held discussions with El Al and the Israel Government Tourist Office (IGTO) in a bid to launch Israel as a mass-market destination. Together, the trio staged roadshows, seminars and other special events to promote Israel to travel agents. After its first year of bringing Canadians to Israel, Sunquest continues to fine-tune its Israel packages and its method of selling them.

"Last year was kind of an educational year for us," said Desrochers. "We didn't have the product down pat, and our pricing was not as sharp as it could have been. We thought we could manage Israel like any other product but we learned it's more complicated than that."

To improve service, Sunquest has given special training and familiarization tours to 12 of its 80 reservation agents, who now operate a dedicated reservations desk where travel agents' questions and concerns regarding Israel are expeditiously handled. Sunquest's director of product development for Israel and the Eastern Mediterranean is Ari Bauer, a former Israeli tour guide with 17 years experience.

Among other tasks, Bauer tailors itineraries for diverse groups with specific interests. "In setting up itineraries for Catholic, Protestant and Jewish groups, you have to understand that each group would want to see completely different things," he said. Sunquest could bring 40 groups to Israel this year, he said.

The company expects to make the greatest inroads with "the Christian market, the people who would never consider Israel as a destination," Desrochers explained. Its lavish 52-page color brochure, produced in conjunction with the IGTO and El Al, is available from as many as 3,000 travel agents across the country.

The Sunquest brochure describes an assortment of packages involving coach tours, rental cars, stays at kibbutzim and spas, Eilat holidays and Egyptian extensions. Here's just one great package: the Israel Experience, which includes return airfare and an 11-day coach tour, costs as little as $2,223 (double occupancy). For more details, pick up the Sunquest brochure from your travel agent.

Tourism statistics and projections released recently by Ruth Ben-Tzur, director of the Israel Government Tourist Office in Canada, paint a picture of healthy growth. In 1992, some 1.8 million tourists visited Israel. Last year, the number had increased to 1.9 million. For 1994, as a result of the peace initiative and the new ties with the Vatican, Uzi Baram, Israel's minister of tourism, estimates that 2.5 million tourists may visit the Jewish state. Even more astonishing, he predicts that Israel could receive 5 million visitors by the year 2000.

Baram's ministry, which has projected a shortage of 40,000 hotel rooms this year, has joined with the private sector to develop Israel's tourism infrastructure. The ministry has therefore approved the construction of additional rooms and buildings near Jerusalem's King David Hotel and the Holiday Inn Crowne Plaza Jerusalem (formerly the Hilton).

Eilat has also seen much hotel construction and improvements recently. The newest property in the Red Sea resort is the $7-million Rif Hotel, which has 71 studio rooms and eight large suites. As well, the 227-room Sport Hotel in Eilat has just undergone an $800,000 renovation in expectation of a large increase of tourists.

A new service called Boker Tov Jerusalem lists rooms available for rent in private homes in the Israeli capital. The computerized listing contains some 200 entries and can be accessed by writing Boker Tov Jerusalem, Binyanei Ha'ooma, Jerusalem. Tel: 02-511-270. Fax: 02-511-272.

Dating from the Hellenistic period, a cave outside Jerusalem with colored paintings of mythological animals, bearded lions, horses and riders, giraffes and other wild animals has been opened to public view. The ancient cave paintings in Bet Govrin National Park were discovered at the turn of the century and have been restored. The park boasts a variety of historical settlements from the biblical, Greek, Phoenician and Roman eras, with walls, public buildings, churches and hundreds of caves open for public viewing.

Guidebook to Israel

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

Not long ago, an acquaintance planning to visit Israel for the first time quizzed me about sights she should see. Obligingly, I launched into what, in retrospect, seems like a long-winded exposition.

I could have saved her and myself a lot of time had I simply directed her to a proper guidebook.

One such book is the Bazak Israel Guide, which has been in business for the past 32 years. The 1994-1995 edition (HarperCollins Canada, $29.50), which has just rolled off the press, maintains the tradition of providing useful information in a direct style.

Running at more than 500 pages, Bazak Israel Guide offers a rounded picture of the Jewish state. You'll have to plough through about 155 pages before you reach the destinations of choice, but it's an informative, even stimulating, journey of the mind.

You'll read about the land, the history and the state. You'll learn about Israel's monotheistic religions, sects and distinct cultural communities. And finally, you'll familiarize yourself with Israel's varied health resorts and recommended restaurants.

Having absorbed all that, you'll be ready to immerse yourself in the heart and soul of this guide — the sights.

Although I've visited Israel on more than a few occasions, I'm still amazed by its geographic diversity and its capacity to enchant even the most jaded souls. From the cool pine forests of the northern Galilee to the arid canyons of the Negev, the eye is riveted on Israel.

With the help of lavish photographs and maps, Bazak Israel Guide covers the country like its early morning dew. The text is simple and direct, like the Israelis themselves. No convoluted descriptions here.

In a guide of this size and scope, mistakes and bloopers are bound to pop up. I bumped into several.

While the Druze community is described as "a loyal minority group," no such endorsement is applied to Israeli Arabs. It's an insensitive juxtaposition.

The Golan Heights was annexed in 1981, not 1982. And it's news to me that Israel captured the Golan "to prevent (a Syrian) attempt to divert" the Banias River. To the best of my knowledge, there were more compelling reasons.

These caveats notwithstanding, Bazak Israel Guide stays clear of error and needless controversy. Pack it into your travelling bag. You'll need it when you're touring Israel.

HOTEL EXPANSION IN EILAT

The new Holiday Inn in Eilat in due to open in the spring. The hotel has a commanding view across the Eilat Lagoon. This year will see the biggest growths in hotel accommodation in this Red Sea resort. Already the town offers the tourists a range of over 30 hotels of all grades. This spring will see the opening of the Royal Beach Hotel and the Holiday Inn. At the end of 1994 the new Dan Hotel is due to be completed. These three hotels alone will make available well over a 1,000 more rooms for Eilat's visitors. Last year 82,000 foreign tourists flew here from Europe. [Israel photo]

Vultures find new home in Orlando

ORLANDO, Fl. — To many, they're so ugly they're cute. The Cinereous vultures. The largest of the old world birds of prey.

Although sinister-looking, these buzzards are an important link in nature's food chain. Like an environmental vacuum cleaner, they remove the remains of animals from woods and roadsides.

The Cinereous vulture is considered one of the most jeopardized of all types of vultures, with only an estimated 44 in zoological parks and aquariums in the United States and about 800 worldwide. Currently listed as "threatened," they are likely to be placed on the "endangered" list in the near future.

The American Association of Zoological Parks and Aquariums (AAZPA) is hoping to encourage reproduction of the Cinereous vulture through breeding programs at Sea World and 26 other North American zoos and parks. So far, there have been 23 successful hatchlings, all hand-reared.

Recently, a pair of Cinereous vultures were introduced to Sea World of Florida's extensive avian collection. "These impressive vultures add variety to the bird population here at the park. They also exemplify our ongoing commitment to education and conservation," said Sherry Branch, curator of birds at the Orlando-based marine life park.

Originally from North Africa and Europe, the Cinereous vulture is scientifically known as Aegypius monachus. The pair at Sea World are approximately 22 years old, weigh 8-10 kilos and have a wing span of approximately two metres. Although both birds were hatched in the wild and parent raised, they have lived most of their lives in zoological facilities.

Sea World's team of aviculturists have made a home for the vultures on an island near the park's front entrance. The area is representative of the birds' natural environment, providing seclusion and privacy for these reclusive animals.

The birds have already become part of the park's breeding program, recently laying their first egg. Like humans, they had to be given time to bond as a pair. "Shortly after their arrival at the park, we began seeing signs of courtship behavior, like preening each other's feathers and building a nest of their own. This increased activity at the nest site was a positive sign," stated aviculturist Laura Dennis. Unfortunately, the first egg layed was infertile, but park officials are hopeful for the future. Because of the vultures' breeding cycle another egg is not due until March 1994.

In addition to providing a suitable habitat for vultures, Sea World's aviculturists must also meet the birds' other needs. Carnivorous animals, their diet consists of rabbit and rat meat, as well as Nebraska bird of prey diet. "We also administer vitamins and minerals, and closely observe their eating habits to ensure proper nutrition," Dennis said. "For example, in their natural environment, they wouldn't necessarily eat every day, so we fast the birds one day each week. This fasting gives them a chance to clean out their system."

Man is the only natural enemy of the vultures; encroachment and habitat destruction are the primary reasons for their threatened status. However, reduction of food supply, use of poisons, pollution, illegal hunting and invasion of nest sites all have negative effects on the population.

"The main stumbling block for the survival of the Cinereous vulture is simply the fact that they nest in trees and are easily accessible to man and animal. At the same time, their land is being cleared at an alarming rate," said Branch.

Although man is largely responsible for the population decline of this animal, through breeding programs like that at Sea World, strides are being made to see that this species survives for future generations. "It is great to be part of the program to rejuvenate this species. This species is in danger, but here at Sea World, we have great hopes for a wonderful breeding program. Our goal is to see young Cinereous vultures next year," Branch stated.

The Cinereous vulture has been placed under the protection of the Species Survival Plan (SSP). This program, designed by the AAZPA, organizes a management group to closely monitor the status of this captive group as well as other species.

Sea World of Florida is an Anheuser-Busch Theme Park. Other Anheuser-Busch Theme Parks include Busch Gardens parks in Tampa and Williamsburg, Va.; Water Country USA in Williamsburg; Sesame Place in Langhorne, Pa., near Philadelphia; Adventure Island in Tampa; the Sea World parks in San Diego, Calif., San Antonio, Texas, and Aurora, Ohio; and Cypress Gardens near Winter Haven, Fla.

Global Mutual Fund RRSP/RRIF opportunities

With interest rates today lower than they've been in years, mutual fund investments can be an effective way to accumulate wealth and minimize risk over time. But with over 600 equity, bond, balanced, mortgage and other mutual funds to choose from, finding and choosing the right fund can be confusing.

Being an independent financial consultant with Counsel Financial Services Corporation enables me to sell a whole array of mutual funds such as Fidelity, Dynamic, Global Strategy, Templeton and Trimark, just to name a few. I work for the investor. Not being tied to one family of mutual funds, I am free to take an unbiased approach with respect to client goals and aspirations, as well as provide objective advice on how they might best be achieved.

The economic recovery has taken hold in North America. Stocks continue to have greater growth potential than fixed income investments. I recommend that you keep your portfolio properly diversified and consider a balanced portfolio with a stronger weighting in equities (locally and globally), if you are

Although stock markets this year may experience a correction, which often occurs following strong periods of growth, we would view this as a signal of pause rather than an end to the upward momentum. The experts continue to foresee low inflation and interest rates through 1994, despite Canadian currency volatility. Don't let these short-term fluctuations affect your long-term investment strategy.

Any time is a good time to make your RRSP contribution. The fact is, however, most Canadians wait until the legal deadline to invest in this most important tax shelter. For the 1993 tax year, that means contributing before March 1, 1994. It's best to invest well in advance of the deadline, for two important reasons. First, those who set their contribution targets early and invest early (often on a monthly basis) find it easier to budget for a larger tax-sheltered investment than those who wait. And second, the more you contribute the better off you'll be, both in the short term, through tax refunds, and in the long term, as you accumulate a larger total portfolio.

Contributing earlier in the tax year also gives your RRSP investment greater time to compound and grow in value. Still, it's a matter of choice. What's vitally important is to never miss a year. Always contribute and always contribute to an investment that delivers superior long-term returns. Returns that significantly outpace inflation. And the best way to ensure this is to invest for growth with long-term mutual fund assets, such as those investing in equities and bonds.

More Canadian investors are recognizing that it is prudent to have a portion of their investment portfolio in non-Canadian securities. Investors such as you see Global Diversification of assets as a means to provide an added measure of protection to their portfolios, through geographic currency diversification.

You can now hold 18 per cent of the value of your RRSP in foreign funds, rising to 20 per cent beginning January 1994, along with higher contribution limits of $13,500. International diversification makes sense as a hedge against declining markets and the Canadian dollar. It offers opportunities to invest in companies and economies in parts of the world that have better economic growth prospects than Canada.

So don't limit your investment potential. Learn how the new RRSP contribution rules and wide range of mutual fund products can work for you. For a complete package of information, or for a no-cost, no obligation consultation, please call me at 416-866-3012.

We all know the importance of using RRSPs to save for the future, whether it is for retirement, early retirement or just to increase the amount you save by the tax deduction and shelter your savings from tax reporting. Today the big question is where to make those RRSP deposits.

I started selling RRSPs over 25 years ago, in 1968, and coincidentally, that was when Mutual Funds were having one of their first big sales rallies. I had already experienced Mutual Funds, buying one myself for $10 a month in 1962 — four years later, when I really needed the $480 I thought that I had saved, I found out that Mutual Funds weren't exactly the same as a savings account. For this reason, I started out by selling only guaranteed investments for RRSPs. Even though I did sell some Mutual Funds outside of RRSPs to those who wanted to participate in the stock and bond markets. This strategy served me and my clients well until the last couple of years.

You see, I always felt that as long as you obtained a certain minimum threshold of guaranteed return, such as 7½ per cent in the '70s, before we knew about inflation, and then 10 per cent in the '80s and early '90s, your retirement fund would grow enough to provide the income needed during retirement. Any extra money available for investment could be used more speculatively in Mutual Funds outside the RRSP. This strategy became even more important after the introduction of Capital Gains tax and the Capital Gains exemption on the first $100,000 of such gains. Of course, that exemption may be taken away in the next budget.

Study the economy

So what do we do now that interest rates have dropped to the point where it is almost impossible to find even a 6 per cent, five year GIC from a reputable financial institution? We look at all of the alternatives, we study the economy, the market condition, the global factors, the other investment analysts and, after all of that, we change our recommendations. Yes, the time has come for us to look at Mutual Funds as the investment of choice for this year's new RRSP deposits and for prior investments that are now coming due.

Let me explain my reasoning. Interest rates are at a 30 year low, and inflation has dropped to under 2 per cent, and it looks like both of these will stay at these levels for at least the next two years, maybe even longer. Our economy is poised for growth, with every analyst predicting at least 3 per cent growth in Canada for the coming year. After four very sluggish years, from 1989 to 1992 inclusive, Canadian stock markets finally surged ahead in 1993, gaining over 30 per cent. If we look to the United States, where the recession was neither as deep nor as long, their stock markets had a 30 per cent gain in 1991, followed by two years of solid 10 per cent gains. Since we traditionally follow the United States by two years, I think we can expect at least two such years in Canada. Of course, the most compelling reason is still that there are no viable investment alternatives. This lack of options will also fuel markets.

While I realize that many of you might be seniors who may be close to retirement, or to age 71, or may even be using their RRSPs as RRIFs, this advice still stands, as long as you feel that your investments will be around for five to seven years or longer. You, as much as anyone, need to get the most out of your RRSP investments.

If I have now convinced you that Mutual Funds is the place to be for the next few years, that is the easy part; the hard part is deciding in which of the more than 150 funds you should be investing. This requires a personal consultation to fit the right fund to your own individual needs.

Launch of Municipal Trust Mortgage and GIC Centre a success

With the recent opening of Municipal Trust's Mortgage and GIC Centre at 343 Wilson Ave. (west of Bathurst), consumers now have a greater choice in finding competitive interest rates for Guaranteed Investment Certificates and Mortgages.

With a 27 full-service branch network exclusively in smaller towns and cities in Ontario, Municipal Trust today has over $1 billion in assets. Demand for Municipal Trust's investment and mortgage products was a principal reason for opening this new GIC and mortgage office in North York. Local residents can certainly expect the same attention to customer service that has made Municipal Trust the choice of many consumers in Ontario's heartland communities.

Jim Hill, vice-president and general manager of the Mortgage and GIC Centre said recently, "We are all thrilled at the positive response we've received since opening the new office in early November. In retrospect, I believe our recent success is partially a result of the existing awareness of Municipal Trust by many discerning investors in Toronto. However, opening a new office in this area, demonstrates our firm commitment to serve the investment and mortgage needs of this local community in particular."

Municipal Trust also offers RSP-GICs. The friendly staff at the Wilson and Bathurst office are looking forward to helping customers find the best possible return for their RSP cointributions. Call the Municipal Trust Mortgage and GIC Centre today at (416) 633-0161. Their office is conveniently open from 9 a.m. to 9 p.m., Monday - Friday; Saturday, 9 a.m. to 5 p.m.

Firm caters to client needs

Because individuals today have a much longer life span, prudent retirement planning has become a critical issue. One must combine safety and growth opportunities to achieve their main financial objective which is to have sufficient funds to provide for a comfortable retirement. This can be accomplished by combining the compounding return of interest-bearing investments and capital appreciation. Diversification through asset allocation and geography are some of the most significant factors to achieving these returns.

For the average investor, the stock market can be intimidating. For these individuals, the answer to their needs can well be mutual funds which are professionally managed and geographically diversified. Also, mutual funds are a safer, more conservative entry into the stock market while providing average returns.

At Richardson Greenshields, one of Canada's largest independently-owned investment firms, the individual client's needs are a priority. When working closely with clients, our first obligation is to determine those needs and objectives and to build a strong level of trust with each individual.

As an investment advisor with Richardson Greenshields, Sheila Katzin prides herself on being totally dedicated to assisting clients and dealing with their investment concerns.

Sheila would be pleased to review your financial program with you in complete confidentially.

How to select a mutual fund

There are now several hundred mutual funds available to the Canadian investor. How can you choose the one for you? The following are six important steps that will help you evaluate which mutual funds will be best for you.

1. Read the fine print of the prospectus.
2. Evaluate risk and reward.
3. Review manager profiles.
4. Assess performance.
5. Compare loads and fees.
6. Define your investment goals.

While these steps will help you to ensure suitability of the investment, as always, it is important to obtain professional advice when contemplating the appropriateness of any investment. For a complimentary copy of ScotiaMcLeod's brochure which describes these six steps in detail, contact Leon Aram at 226-7440.

- Working Ventures Canadian Fund is a labour-sponsored investment fund that invests primarily in small and medium-sized business.
- Such investments offer the potential for above-average returns but involve higher risks than many other investments.
- An investment in Working Ventures requires a long-term commitment and cannot guarantee any specific rate of return or any return. Redemption of shares of Working Ventures is subject to certain conditions.
- Attractive tax credits available to investors in Working Ventures provide immediate benefits and are intended to offset these risks.

Important information about this investment fund is contained in its prospectus. Obtain a copy from a securities dealer such as ScotiaMcLeod and read it carefully before investing. Share value and investment return will fluctuate.

What's with interest rates?

This seems to be the most popular tune sung these days. Although interest rates are at their lowest level in years you don't have to settle for these returns. Many have turned to mutual funds . . . but there are still those who ask: "What's all the fuss?"

Just 10 years ago, most people hadn't heard of mutual funds. Today, the industry is expected to grow to over $250 billion by the end of the decade! Here are a few fund features that may help you understand why you should consider investing in a mutual fund.

Affordability — begin a monthly installment plan for as little as $25 a month

Diversification — pool your resources with other investors so every fund unit you buy entitles you to partial ownership of a large, diversified portfolio

Selection — each mutual fund has specific investment objectives that dictate how your money will be invested so the choices are yours

Professional Management — experienced portfolio managers monitor the markets and manage your money full time

Accessibility — mutual fund units can be cashed in at any time, without hassles or delays although redemption charges may apply

Convenience — you'll receive transaction confirmations, regular account statements and tax slips if applicable

No wonder millions of Canadians have turned to mutual fund investing!

Legislation favors self-directed RRSP investors

Faced with the prospect of purchasing GICs at five per cent or less, many RRSP savers are quickly learning to become investors through a self-directed RRSP. Understanding the investment implications of two recent changes to government legislation is an important step toward completing this transformation.

One such legislative change allows mutual fund managers to invest RRSP money in Government of Canada T-bills and acquire future contracts on the various foreign stock and bond indexes the particular fund is designed to emulate. This innovative structure permits the funds to be considered fully eligible for your RRSP by Revenue Canada, but still gives you complete participation in the growth potential offered by markets outside Canada. The result has been a number of new mutual funds designed to take advantage of this change. One of my personal 1994 favorites from these new types of funds is one that invests in European equity markets as interest rates are likely to head lower and corporate profits start trending higher.

The second legislative change is the increase in the foreign content allowed in a self-directed RRSP to 20 per cent for 1994. With the 10-year return for the Canadian equity market only 9 per cent, and the Morgan Stanley World Stock index 16.3 per cent, it makes investment sense to use this legislation to your advantage. To put this in a tangible way, $20,000 (of a $100,000 RRSP) invested in the Canadian Equity Market would have increased to $47,347 over the last 10 years. However, invested in the global portion, your investment would have grown to $92,615, double the return on the Canada-only investment! With smaller companies growing in 1994, why not seek out a global emerging companies fund!

To take full advantage of these changes, RRSP savers have found the assistance of an investment executive critical to becoming RRSP investors. The leading Canadian brokerage firms offer self-directed RRSPs plus access to a wide variety of mutual funds. Their investment executives, backed by their firm's investment research, are well positioned to formulate a sound investment plan, select the appropriate mutual funds and offer ongoing recommendations relative to these new RRSP-eligible mutual funds.

The opportunities offered by these two legislation changes can result in substantially increased investment returns and reduced RRSP risk. Become an RRSP investor today and be confident that you can retire in comfort!

Invest with the best

With 16 years experience, the knowledgeable partners of Sherr, Bergstein and Crackower can invest your savings in a manner best suited to you.

The firm is primarily a retirement planning firm, dealing in mutual funds, RRSPs, RIFs and annuities.

Partner Earl Crackower speaks of the importance of carefully examining your investment and weighing it against the risk. Lower returns come with less risk. Mutual funds are a long-term investment and consequently will have both high points and low points. Crackower explains that the key factor is to "understand that with growth comes market corrections. When the values go down, it's really a good time to buy or to hold on to what you have." Mutual funds are investments that come with some risk. Younger people would be more likely to invest in funds with higher risk because there is more time for the peaks and valleys of investment markets to ultimately achieve the desired results.

An older investor might be better off investing in income funds containing mortgage-backed securities, treasury bills or long-term Canada bonds and bluechip stocks. These are funds that are conservative, not volatile, and have good long-term track records with low risks. You can find funds that are stable and produce a good return.

Crackower adds that there is "a lot of good opportunity in Canadian investment funds." Contrary to the doom and gloom which is constantly in the financial press, he sees signs of an economic recovery.

Sanctuary Denied
by Gerhard P. Bassler
288 pp., $24.95

Canada's shameful policy of excluding European Jewish refugees on the eve of World War II was definitively chronicled in Irving Abella and Harold Troper's now famous book, None is too Many.

But even Canada's disgraceful record pales next to that of pre-Confederation Newfoundland.

Gerhard Bassler, a professor of history at Newfoundland's Memorial University, documents in Sanctuary Denied that not one of the almost 5,000 Jewish refugee applicants was granted safe haven.

Published last September by Memorial University's Institute of Social and Economic Research, this meticulously-researched account of Newfoundland immigration policy between 1906 and 1949, the year the British colony became the 10th province (and the reason why Newfoundland was excluded from None is too Many), is destined to become a landmark study of Canadian and Newfoundland immigration policies during that period, a companion piece to Abella and Troper's work.

Bassler rooted out previously undiscovered documents from Newfoundland, Britain, Germany and Canada to reveal a society in which the door to refugees should have been open, but were shut tight to all but a few British immigrants.

Bassler bluntly states why: the unwarranted fears and vested interests of Newfoundland's business and professional elites in a historic climate of resentment against foreigners.

The rejection of European refugees, argues Bassler, culminated a process begun in 1906 with the passing of Newfoundland's Aliens Act.

Ironically, Bassler contends, if the Act had been enforced in good faith, legitimate refugees would have met the expressed need to bring more settlers to Newfoundland's shores.

In 1934 Newfoundland established a special "Commission of Government" to revitalize the colony's administration and moribund economy. Simon Belkin, a secretary for the Canadian wing of the Jewish Colonization Association (ICA), presented to the commission a proposal that would have brought 40 German-Jewish refugee families, about a quarter of them physicians, to Newfoundland at the ICA's expense.

Belkin received a measure of support from the most influential commissioner, Sir John Hope Simpson, an international authority on refugee issues whom Bassler describes generously as a "man of vision and cosmopolitcan experience."

Hope Simpson felt Belkin's idea should at least have been put before the public. But interference by St. John's medical establishment forced the commission to reject Belkin's plan.

In an excellent summary, Bassler writes that the decision against the ICA typified the influence of Newfoundland's vested interests over immigration policy. It "was the test case and set the precedent for subsequent refugee policy."

From that point, "it did not matter whether the applicant was a needed professional, a highly qualified specialist, an experienced farmer, a person financially sponsored by a local resident, or even a parent or brother of a naturalized citizen.

"The inability of a prosperous local businesswoman and naturalized resident...to rescue her parents or brother from Poland on the eve of World War II, epitomizes the relentlessly inflexible attitude of the ruling elite towards the refugees, as well as the precarious position of Newfoundland's small community of Polish Jews.

Rejected on different grounds

"Cases were not judged on the basis of law, reason, usefulness, or compassion. Each applicant was rejected on different grounds at the arbitrary decision of the Chief Commissioner of Immigration or the Commissioner for Justice."

Foreigners residing in Newfoundland were continually singled out for stigmatization, according to Gassler, saying "Newfoundland stands out not only for the minute number of fugitives from Nazi persecution who ganied entry, but also for their harrasment as suspects until well after the end of the war."

When all is said and done, writes Gassler, "the perception [by the professional, educated and business elites] of the 'foreign' immigrant as an undesirable, unwanted intruder in a closed, ethnically homogeneous society emerges as the leitmotif of Newfoundland's pre-Confederation immigration and refugee policy.

"Despite the widely publicized contemporary evidence of the refugees' ability to make economic contributions, Newfoundland continued to perceive refugees as taking rather than creating jobs.

"Once the negative image had been reinforced sufficiently so as to no longer be questioned, it was easy to justify the denial of sanctuary on the grounds of high local unemployment."

Compared to Canada, notes Gassler, which admitted "at least a token number" of refugees before World War II, it was really Newfoundland that carried out the "none is too many" policy to the very letter.

Hardufs release paperback English-Hebrew dictionary

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A beautifully printed, transliterated English-Hebrew dictionary in paperback, typeset in Israel, has been published by the well-known Toronto lexicographers David Mendel Harduf and Eleanor Harduf.

Two hundred copies of the first volume of this dictionary, in handsome large type, on wood-free paper, covering A to D, were printed.

Basically a Hebrew scholar, author of lexicons of biblical names and the works of the Nobel Prize winner Shmuel Yosef Agnon, Harduf discovered in his later years his love and attachment to the Yiddish language and its literature.

He has therefore published many English-Yiddish and Yiddish-English dictionaries as well as reference books of biblical literature.

Because of the Holocaust, he said, Yiddish has become the holy tongue of a martyred people and deserves to be preserved and cherished. Thus, his ambition became to make a lasting contribution to its preservation.

Titles designed just for kids

By LAUREN KIRSHNER
Special to The CJN

Kids between the ages of six and 13 will be glad to know about three newly-published books: Sworn Enemies by Carol Matas; Leonard Bernstein, A Passion For Music by Johanna Hurwitz, and illustrated by Sonia O. Lisker; and The Jewish Kids' Wordbook by Chaya Burstein.

Sworn Enemies follows the lives of two teenage boys in Czarist Russia. One of the boys, Zev, a khapper, is someone who kidnaps Jewish boys of military age for the czar's army. The other boy, Aaron, is a dedicated yeshiva student who's Zev's prey. Matas follows their separate adventures in two different towns in Russia. The author tells graphically of the hardships they experience. This book is recommended for children 10 years and older. It is published by Harper Collins.

Leonard Bernstein, A Passion For Music is also recommended for children 10 years and older. It is the latest book in the Jewish Publication Society's biography series. Hurwitz traces Bernstein's life from childhood through his brilliant musical career. The biography is wonderfully enhanced by music lover/artist Lisker's illustrations. It is on sale now for $12.95.

The Jewish Kids' Wordbook, a new full color book, has just been published by the Jewish Publication Society. Written and illustrated by Burstein, it is an essential book for children just beginning to learn Hebrew. The 40 page book is beautifully illustrated, and is written in Hebrew and English. This volume, with over 400 words and sayings, is recommended for children six years and up. It is selling for $16.95.

Laments media attention

TORONTO — The "incendiary attacks" of those opposed to the production of Show Boat could have caused violence in the streets if cooler heads had not prevailed, Garth Drabinsky, head of Live Entertainment, told The Empire Club of Canada recently. The title of his talk was Life Upon the Wicked Stage: Freedom of Artistic Expression.

Since October, 200,000 people "of all races, creeds and colors," have attended Show Boat, Drabinsky said, "and the racist label has essentially disappeared."

Instead of attacking the stereotypes of blacks in pop music and movies, a small group of blacks in Toronto "decided there was local political coverage to be gained in attacking Mayor Mel Lastman, the North York Performing Arts Centre and myself," Drabinsky said. "It was their springboard to achieve political power.

"What disturbed me most was the silence of political and business leaders, not only in the Jewish and black community, but in the general community. The ambivalence of our public leaders was appalling. For the first time in my career, the prime minister, the governor general, the leaders of the opposition parties, the premier of Ontario and the mayor of Toronto did not attend the opening of a major production."

Likening the Coalition to Stop Show Boat to the German Nazi regime's burning of books, Drabinsky lamented the media attention to the controversy.

"I could not help but wish all the newspaper ink and broadcast time devoted to the controversy could have been spent on explorations of Show Boat's artistic themes and ideas, especially its message of racial tolerance," he said. — B.R.

Ottawa-born writer Levine finally coming to prominence

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Norman Levine, the son of an Ottawa fruit pedlar, may not be as famous as his friend Mordecai Richler, but at least one critic thinks Levine will be remembered long after other Canadian writers are forgotten.

A new appreciation of the 70-year-old author, now living in southern France with his second wife (his first died in 1978) appears to be on the way. Two of his books, Canada Made Me and From a Seaside Town have been republished in handsome editions by Porcupine Quill, Inc. of Erin, a quality house.

"Levine is an underrated writer," said Prof. Adam Fuerstenberg of Ryerson Polytechnical University.

In Norman Levine and his Works, critic Lawrence Mathews said the Ottawa-born writer has had to overcome the indifference of literary savants who cast baleful eyes at his long residence in England. For instance, Margaret Atwood ignored him in Survival, a Thematic Guide to Canadian Literature. But, Mathews says, history will restore Levine to his proper place.

Levine's parents, Moses and Annie (Gurevich) Levine, came from Poland to Ottawa where they lived on Murray Street in Lower Town, near By Ward Market, where Moses Levine peddled with a horse and wagon.

In his semi-autobiographical books, Levine writes frequently of Ottawa Jewish life — not usually in a positive way. (He once described himself as a writer first, and a Jew second.) An exception is his warm description of the meal between Mincha and

Norman Levine

Maariv on the Sabbath in the old Adath Jeshurun Synagogue on King Edward Avenue. This is offset by his remarking in Canada Made Me that Jewish parents welcomed postwar immigrants for their unmarriageable daughters, but sent their own sons to Montreal where there was more choice.

If Levine is to be placed in context, it is with Philip Roth and Mordecai Richler, who, like Levine, have taken an acerbic view of middle class Jewish life.

"I didn't want to become a Canadian Jew. I couldn't make the change from what my parents were to what I see walking in Ottawa and Montreal. When it was necessary, at the start, to change one's name, to live with two calendars, and tell little lies about oneself--I told whoppers," he writes in From a Seaside Town.

Of his time at McGill University, after service in the RCAF as a Lancaster bomber pilot, he said: "If I met any Jews on the campus who stuck together and went to the Hillel Club I had nothing to do with them. Yet on my own, I'd sneak over to Waxman's Restaurant on Park Avenue...for gefilte fish, helzel, latkas, and to watch the others eat."

A Canadian publisher refused to bring out Canada Made Me in 1958 because he said it gave a misleading picture of the country. It was many years later before Deneau and Greenberg published it in Canada.

Levine has friends and enemies among Canadian readers and critics. Some say his unadorned, simple, direct prose is a delight and stays in the mind long after the words are off the page. Others say he is dull as ditchwater and that his protaganists are depressing and self-serving. In an interview with Queen's Quarterly, Levine said: "I try in my own kind of way, I suppose, to give a certain dignity to people who get pushed around."

At any rate, this enigmatic author was years ahead of his time in detailing the intimacies of a marriage for all the world to read.

The editors of the Porcupine Quill edition of From a Seaside Town, John Metcalfe and John Newlove, say of the book's protaganist, Joseph Grand: "A Canadian Jew, Grand has spent a lifetime seeking to submerge his past. Now as a consequence, he discovers he belongs nowhere."

BILL GLADSTONE'S

EYE ON ARTS

Toronto-born sculptor May Marx, who has been sculpting for some 30 years, says she was a struggling artist until she got wise about a dozen years ago.

"I decided I didn't want to be a typical artist, waiting to be discovered. So I took control of my own life as an artist and went looking for my own markets."

She came up with the idea that the corporate world should be using art, not gold watches, as awards of excellence. In a period of excited creativity, she created a series of small sculptures ranging in height from one to 15 inches. Representatives of the real estate company Royal LePage saw them and ordered about 60 castings to be used as corporate awards of excellence.

About that time, Marx also made a sculpture reflecting the Chrysler logo, then showed it to the U.S. auto giant. Although the company never used it as an award of excellence, Chrysler president Lee Iacocca bought it for $5,000 and kept it on his desk for years.

Usually between six and 14 inches high, Marx's sculptures are generally cast in bronze from styrofoam models. Polished and stylized, they seem to embody a company's history, philosophy and goals. Today Northern Telecom, Diet Pepsi, Hiram Walker, Coles, Maclean Hunter, the federal government and the provincial ministries of transportation and health are some of her many satisfied clients. Another is Loeb Inc., the grocery concern, which featured Marx in a video about the sculpting of their award of excellence.

Marx, who has a comfortable studio in Toronto's Parkdale area as well as a secretary and a studio assistant, is one of the few visual artists in Canada to break into the six-figure salary range. She is preparing for several showings at premium and incentive trade fairs. One is set for New York in May, two others for Toronto and Chicago in September.

The award-winning artist and grandmother is also keen on genealogy and has rendered a series of sculptures of her great-grandmother and other family members.

Beth Tikvah, 3080 Bayview Ave. in Toronto, presents A Musical Feast on Saturday, Feb. 19 at 8:15 p.m. Featured performers are Cantor Efraim Sapir, internationally acclaimed cellist Dennis Brott and the Beth Tikvah Choir, which at 27 is the oldest group of lay synagogue singers in Canada. Most have been with the choir at least a quarter century.

The program includes works by Rossi, Schumann, Piatagorsky, Popper and Alexander Brott, the cellist's father. The conductor is Beth Tikvah musical director Srul Irving Glick, who has written Shirat Ha-Nefesh, a religious work involving cantor, choir, flute, clarinet and piano that is set to receive its Canadian premiere.

A Musical Feast also features pianist Glen Montgomery, flutist Anne-Marie Kopp and clarinetist Sigal Hechtlinger. "This event gives the choir an opportunity to present to the community at large," says publicist and choir member Marilyn Birenbaum.

Tickets are $10 ($8 for students and seniors), available through the synagogue office at 221-3433.

As part of its regular music series, Beth Tikvah presents From Ragtime to Bernstein on Sunday, March 13 at 8 p.m. Saxophonist Paul Brodie and pianist Valerie Tryon, both accomplished musicians with international followings and ample discologies, present the works of Berlin, Rodgers, Gershwin, Bernstein, Glick and others, all done with exquisite taste and a healthy dash of fun. Tickets are $15 ($12 for students and seniors), available through the synagogue office or at the Israel's Judaica or the Negev bookstore.

After flocking to Phantom of the Opera and Les Miserables, are Torontonians ready for another dark theatrical romance from France? Marlene Smith and Ernie Rubenstein hope the answer is yes. They are among the producers of Napoleon, a $4.5-million musical love story set to open at Toronto's Elgin-Winter Garden on March 23 (previews begin March 9).

The play chronicles the stormy relationship between Napoleon and Josephine, using the turbulent chaos of post-revolutionary France and Europe as backdrop. For this world premiere, the 32-member cast is backed by a full orchestra. Playing time is almost three hours, including intermission. Tickets run $45 to $80. Why the fascination with this particular period? "Maybe it was just a really wonderful era," suggests Smith, who previously staged Cats in the same theatre. They must have done something right to get everybody so interested."

Live Entertainment of Canada Inc. announced last week that it had acquired the worldwide theatrical rights to E.L. Doctorow's best-selling 1975 novel Ragtime, which it intends to adapt into a stage musical. Set in America at the turn of the century, Ragtime tells the story of three families — upper middle-class WASP, Harlem black, and socialist immigrant Jew — whose lives become intertwined with historical figures like Henry Ford, Emma Goldman, Harry Houdini, J.P. Morgan, Theodore Dreiser and Sigmund Freud. The 1981 film was directed by Milos Forman.

"I consider Ragtime to be one of the richest, most dazzling and original works of fiction to emerge in the past two decades," says Livent chair Garth Drabinsky. "The story is not only compelling and vastly entertaining but — like our current musical hit Show Boat — it places its human drama against a seismic time of upheaval in America's history. Its theatrical possibilities are tremendously exciting."

Tzimmes a glorious musical concoction

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO —A tzimmes is that glorious concoction of carrots, honey, prunes, sometimes raisins, meat, pineapple or potatoes. A tzimmes can also refer, to really mix metaphors, to making a mountain out of a molehill.

There is now a new definition of the word — a dynamite new singing group called (what else?) Tzimmes.

Group spokesman Moshe Denburg said they chose the name because they are a mixture ethnically, Canadian (Denburg and Yiddish-speaking lead singer Myrna Rabinowitz), Israeli (Jerusalem-born Yona Bar-Sever), and Mexican (accordionist Julian Siegel). As well, their music is a blend of Sephardi, Ashkenazi, traditional, klezmer and contemporary, with a dollop of Yiddish, folk and folk-rock thrown in for good measure.

Various configurations of Tzimmes have been around since 1986, in Victoria, B.C. In 1991, Denburg and Siegel, two original members, joined Bar-Seva and Rabinowitz to reconstitute the group.

They have performed on radio, in concerts, at the 1992 Vancouver Walk for Israel and have appeared with the noted folk singer Rabbi Shlomo Carlebach.

And now they have taken the big step - they have recorded Sweet and Hot, a collection of both original and adapted music, which appears on tape and CD.

And what a collection.

A reviewer is supposed to find things to criticize in a production: the choice of music, the arrangements, the background — something. Sweet and Hot makes that job very difficult.

The selections are a genuine "tzimmes." Ladino love songs, sung to a Spanish-sounding musical accompaniment have a naturalness and genuine pathos.

Vechitetu gives the prophesy of Isaiah, "And they shall beat their swords into ploughshares" dramatically and forcefully — this is no seeking after peace from weakness. The more meditative conclusion suggests a desire for rest after the turbulence of constant war.

I especially liked Denburg's version of the traveller's prayer ("May the Lord watch over your going out and coming in ..."). It is an emotional and moving plea for heavenly protection that came close to bringing me to tears.

The Yiddish heritage is not ignored in Sweet and Hot. Who can't relate to the words of Yossel Yossel, a love song from the Yiddish theatre, "Ikh fil ikh shtarb avek/Nokh mayn Yosslen, mayn darling, mayn dear" (loosely, I feel like I am dying because of Yossel, my darling, my dear) and the song sung by so many grandmothers to their infant grandchildren Shein Vi Di Levone.

They even present the traditional cowboy ballad Home on the Range in perfect Yiddish — did you know how to say buffalo in Yiddish? Did you know there even was a word for buffalo in Yiddish? (It's bufloksn, by the way).

A lilting, melodic version of Adon Olam and a folk-rock plea for peace in the Middle East Maiai Taigia Eit Lashalom (When will the time of peace arrive) conclude the tape on an upbeat, innerly spiritual way.

Sweet and Hot is a fine example of the whole range of Jewish music as well as of the talents of the musicians, who throughout show skill, versatility and a genuine feeling for the material. It is highly recommended.

Denburg just told The CJN that Tzimmes is in the process of organizing a tour for next fall which would include Toronto. Look forward to it, as well as to future recordings.

Sweet and Hot is available at Israel's and Negev Jewish books stores, and in popular outlets including Sam's, and HMV.

Mryna Rabinowitz and (clockwise) Moshe Denburg, Yona Bar-Sever and Julian Siegel make up the singing group Tzimmes, whose first recording, Sweet and Hot, is now is stores.

Defying The Holocaust by Aba Gefen (Borgo Press)

Aba Gefen, Israel's first consul general in Toronto and now chair of the Association of the Lithuanian Jews in Israel, can look back on a life replete with misfortune and devastation as well as rich with excitement and achievement.

When the Nazis occupied Lithuania most members of his family were brutally murdered. He, aged 20, and his younger brother survived (1941-1944) by hiding in barns, fields and forests. On several occasions their lives hung by a thread.

Most Lithuanians eagerly welcomed the Germans. The pro-Nazi Activist Front conducted mass arrests of Jews, initiated sadistic pogroms in many cities and boasted that for every German soldier shot, 100 Jews would be put to death.

When the victorious Red Army entered the country Gefen worked for a year with Russian police units investigating Nazi collaborators. He relates how liberated Jews exacted revenge upon their erstwhile tormentors. "Some of them organized the Nekamah, 'revenge' group. They were mostly young people who had belonged to the partisan movement during the war. They did not wish to leave Europe, soaked with the blood of thousands of other relatives and friends, before dealing a deadly blow to the Nazi criminals."

Fearing Russian arrest for his sometimes unauthorized actions, he escaped to Western Europe and embarked on a program of bringing aid and hope to the 250,000 Holocaust survivors who were languishing in German and Austrian refugee camps. As an active member of Birchah, the Israeli clandestine movement that helped refugees emigrate to Israel, he provides detailed information — some of it hitherto unknown — on the numerous and often dangerous stratagems used by Birchah and its friends in arranging for Jewish flight and rescue. In this process they were aided by Jewish chaplains, as well as by officers in the U.S. Army who often performed "illegal" actions to the point of risking their own careers.

With Israeli statehood, Gefen became a valued member of the diplomatic corps and over a 35-year period occupied ambassadorial posts in Toronto, Rome, Lima, Buenos Aires, and Bucharest. He provides much unfamiliar information about these countries and their relationship to Israel.

About his four years in Toronto he recalls his encounters with the United Church Observer and its editor, the Reverend Al Forrest, who was bitterly anti-Israel. Forrest sided with Arabs who committed atrocities and wrote, "You can't belong with these commandos without sympathizing with their cause."

He is unsparing in his criticism of Canada's widespread anti-Semitism, especially in relation to the restrictions on Jewish immigration "when a more flexible attitude could have saved thousands of Jews from the Holocaust." Confronted with the Jewish danger at the time, the responses of government, the civil service and much of the public were indifferent or hostile. Even when the outbreak of war brought evidence of an ongoing Nazi pogrom for the total extirpation of European Jewry, Canada's response on immigration remained legalistic and cold.

Stationed in Romania, he had occasion to study Nicholas Ceausescu at close range. On one hand he was a ruthless dictator, but on the other a brave individual who, after the Six Day War, refused Moscow's demand that he break off diplomatic relations with Israel. Gefen maintains that the payment made by Israel in order for Jews to leave Romania was about $1,000 to $1,500 per capita. "Nothing was paid to Ceausescu' personal account." Compared with Jews in other countries of the Soviet bloc, the situation of Romanian Jewry was comparatively good.

Defying the Holocaust is the story of one man's life, but also a valuable first hand survey of the 50 years of Jewish history in which he was destined to play a significant part.

HEY, MISTER BUS DRIVER

The picture shows Transport Minister Yisrael Kesar examining a new Dan bus ticket dispenser. The Dan bus co-operative is introducing the system on its fleet of buses. The driver will punch in the value of the ticket on a set of keys. Apart from giving the passenger a ticket, the information will go to a computer so that the bus company can assess the number of passengers on various routes, thus enabling them to plan future bus capacity.

Americans buy Israeli brains

By NECHEMIA MEYERS
Special to The CJN

Most of the leading American computer companies have set up research and development facilities in Israel, or are considering their establishment.

Motorola, IBM, Intel, Microsoft, Apple and others are attracted by Israeli brainpower, says Dr. Yossi Bolless, a long-serving air force officer who seven years ago took off his uniform and entered the computer software field, where he heads several thriving companies.

"Like Jews everywhere, Israelis are characterized by their nonconformity and creativity, exactly the qualities that are needed by innovators of software or anything else," says Belless.

"Up to now, a large proportion of this creativity has gone into the development of sophisticated devices to ensure that Israel could survive Arab attempts to destroy her. But now, with peace in the offing, more and more creative people are focusing on civilian rather than military challenges, as reflected in the fact that many of the new hi-tech firms in this country were set up by recently discharged military men."

Overseas firms are attracted not only by Israeli brains, but also by relatively modest salary levels. A talented software engineer working in research and development here will cost them about $60,000 to $80,000 a year, about half the U.S. figure. To be sure, that same type of person could be hired for even less in India or Eastern Europe, but Israel apparently has a better R&D environment than those areas.

Production, and particularly mass production, is a different matter altogether. Wage differences between Israel and Third World countries are so great that, except in special cases, Israel can't compete.

Nevertheless, some American computer companies, such as Motorola and Intel, have production facilities here, as well as 100 per cent Israeli firms which manage to sell locally-manufactured goods at competitive prices in overseas markets. But these tend to be highly specialized and sophisticated goods, like the unique printing equipment made by Scitex.

Well-known international concern

When an Israeli innovator has an attractive product to offer, he can usually get financial support from the Chief Scientist of the Ministry of Industry and Commerce as well as from one or more venture capitalists. Then he must decide whether he wants to have an independent company or to link up with a well-known international concern, thus avoiding the need to establish an expensive, worldwide marketing network. According to Bolless, the latter approach is usually advisable, though it does have its drawbacks.

For example, when National Semiconductor decided to reduce the number of its plants worldwide, the one at Migdal Haemek, near Haifa, was immediately closed down, despite that factory's excellent track record.

However, most of the American computer companies that set up shop here have stayed on and, over the years, expanded their activities. Bolless hopes many more are on their way, though he is less enthusiastic about the prospect of possible linkups with Japanese firms. Whether it is because he read The Rising Sun or for other reasons, Bolless claims that such firms tend to behave like 16th-century Spanish conquistadores, who came in, grabbed whatever they could, and then sailed away with their plunder.

Meanwhile, that issue is academic. For it is the Americans who are busily snapping up Israeli brainpower, while the Japanese are just sniffing around.

The establishment of a successful hi-tech firm gives those responsible not only a good income, but also extremely high prestige. In fact, says Bolless, they are Israel's contemporary role models. For while in decades past kibbutzniks and soldiers were the people most admired by the average Israeli, now the entrepreneurs are at the top of the heap where prestige is concerned.

Bolless drew this conclusion by listening to Eiran, his 12-year-old son, who, like most youngsters, is anxious to be "with it." So when Eiran is asked what his father does, the boy fails to mention that Yossi is a reserve officer and a university lecturer; instead, he proudly proclaims: "my dad is a businessman."

Canada-Israel trade 'good' for Canada

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Many Canadians would like to see a free trade agreement between Canada and Israel, not out of passion for Israel, but rather, because it would be good for Canada, says the national executive director of the Canada-Israel committee.

"Trade now between the two countries is about $250 million, which is not that much for two countries supposed to be friends," Robert Ritter said at a recent meeting sponsored jointly by the continuing education committee of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue and The Institute for International Affairs of B'nai Brith Canada.

He told the group that there are free trade agreements between Israel and the majority of countries with which she trades "so it is in Canada's best interests to reach an agreement because we are now in a minority."

He said that a free trade deal between the two countries would not be "such a big thing. It would be much smaller than NAFTA, but trade itself is not what is important. What is important, is a partnership that could cement political relations and establish a climate in which the two countries work in a harmonious way."

Ritter spoke positively about Premier Bob Rae, who supports a free trade agreement and said that important transactions took place during Rae's recent trip to Israel. "He took with him a team of blue-ribbon CEOs and was able to establish a strategic alliance between hi-tech companies. These first steps send an important message that we need more such delegations."

He said that when normalization takes place in Israel, a lot of money will be spent in the emerging markets of developing countries. "That is where the opportunity for Israel will be. Billions of dollars will be spent and the people in on the ground floor will profit. Canada should be one of those countries.

"Once there is a normal process, or peace, as well as access between countries, there is a huge impetus for major development in terms of infrastructure. There will be a whole frontier of work to be done and Canada has lots of expertise in these areas."

Ritter said that traditionally Canadians have been good when it comes to giving money to Israel but not with regards to investment. "The motive for investing is pure business, not philanthropy, and Israel needs investment. We must provide that kind of support."

He stressed that Canadians need a deliberate, calculated plan, in order to take advantage of initiatives popping up all over Israel and that the Canada-Israel Chamber of Commerce is a good place to which to turn. "It is a hi-tech world and there is a new frontier in terms of Diaspora-Israel relations. It's more like a 2001 Space Odyssey than the Israel of old. Each of us has to find a way to contribute to this new frontier."

He urged the group to encourage others to invest in Israel. "Do business with Israel, not because it is Israel, but because it is good business."

Economist predicts woes for public sector

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — We have gone through three or four years of major painful shake-ups in the private sector and it is not over. But in the public sector, years of cost-cutting are just beginning, says one internationally renowned economist.

"What the public sector is about to do is painfully twist and turn all of us," warned Jacques Singer, the chair of the investment advisory committee of the United Jewish Welfare Fund of Toronto's Bequest and Endowment Fund.

"The tax system is going to get tougher — not necessarily in terms of rates — but in how it is run," he said at a recent downtown luncheon, sponsored by the Fund's Professional Advisory Council.

He stresses that restraint must be found for a public-sector spending binge that has gone virtually unchecked for the better part of a generation or face the consequences.

As a worst-case scenario, Singer said if governments conclude that cost-cutting is too painful, they could throw in the towel and begin printing money. This would result in the kind of hyper-inflation experienced by Germany's Weimer Republic, where at one time it cost four billion marks to send a letter from Berlin to Frankfurt. "I would give it a zero probability for Canada, hopefully, but keep in mind the temptation."

On a recent visit to Alberta, Singer said he saw people demonstrating against public sector cuts in front of the legislature. In his words, he had no comfort to offer them. "Standing here on a cold day in January, I simply say to you, you are at the beginning of this, at best, and nobody can tell you how long it will take. If you want to be generous, you're going to say perhaps you can do it in 10 years."

Singer said Prince Edward Island, British Columbia, Saskatchewan and Newfoundland along with Alberta are at the forefront of cost-cutting. "Here in Ontario, up the street, they're still spinning their wheels."

A decision can be implemented quickly through management in the private sector, he told about 65 lawyers, accountants and financial professionals, "but when you are in the body politic you have two additional risks — you have the voters and you have the government itself telling you 'We are here to represent the people.' "

He adds that the federal Liberal's proposal to deal with the public debt would at the end of four years "at best only stabilize the problem in terms of debt ratios and debt service ratios, rather than deal with it in a sense that we're back to some kind of stability."

Singer says cost-cutting and the search for efficiency and productivity will continue in the private sector. "I can't tell you how much longer that will be, except that I'm still talking years from 1994."

The problem with belt-tightening at the corporate, the industry or the company level, he says, is "displacing something in the short run while waiting for the pie to grow. For the hundred of thousands who are without work that is of no particular help."

Thanks to the yardage that has been recouped by the private sector, Singer says "we're looking a little better in terms of economic performance." He says Canada is competitive again, particularly in North America, and predicts real growth in Canada will reach three per cent in 1994.

"Some financial assets and business investment decisions will continue to provide increasingly rewarding real returns. The securities markets, the bond and stock markets, over the last couple of years have begun to recognize this."

He called the '90s the second worst decade of the 20th century. "It has begun and it will continue to invite comparisons to the 1930s. Those compasions, I hope, essentially will turn out to be exaggerated."

Facts about Israeli stocks, bonds and RRSPs

- The 1993 RRSP contribution deadline is March 1, 1994
- The 1993 maximum contribution is $12,500
- The 1994 maximum contribution is $13,500
- Foreign content can represent 20 per cent of your total RRSP/RRIF
- Fifty Israeli companies that trade on the American exchanges are eligible to be held in your RRSP/RRIF
- The Israeli stock market has gained more than 100 per cent over the past two years
- Both Israeli stocks and State of Israel Bonds are considered foreign content

How to plant an acorn...

First of all, to invest in Israeli Stocks or Bonds you need a self-directed RRSP/RRIF (see your investment advisor or banker). Next, you have to assess your investment profile. Either, (A) you are able to deal with price fluctuations and uncertainty in the short term in exchange for likely long-term outperformance or (B) you cannot deal with uncertainty and need to know exactly what guaranteed rate you will earn.

(A) Any Israeli Stock that trades on the New York Stock Exchange (NYSE) or Nasdaq exchange is eligible for your RRSP/RRIF. At present, stocks that trade on the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange (but not on American exchanges) are not eligible.

Someone who wants to invest $5,000 or less in Israeli Stocks should consider the First Israel Funds (symbol ISL on the NYSE). This is a closed-end mutual fund which holds a portfolio of Israeli stocks. For a complete list of other closed-end funds and individual stocks that are eligible for RRSP/RRIF investing, call the Israel Economic Mission at (416) 961-1242.

(B) Israel Bonds are available in denominations as small as $250 (US). Canadian and American dollar bonds can be invested in RRSPs. Strip bonds are available and have been an extremely popular choice lately. The icing on the cake — the rates are very competitive when compared with Canadian, and especially, U.S. government guaranteed rates. (Note that Israeli government debt has recently been upgraded by American rating agencies).

For more information, call Marcia Cohen at the State of Israel Bonds office at (416) 789-3356.

Other questions and considerations may include the following:

How much of your foreign content eligibility content should be invested in Israeli securities? THis should be discussed with your investment advisor. The 20 per cent foreign content is based on your RRSP/RRIF's book value which is probably different than its market value. Be careful.

While the performance of Israeli Stocks has been outstanding during the past few years and the economic prospects of Israel grow brighter by the day, Israeli stocks will not go up in a straight line.

Consider planting an Israeli acorn in your RRSP/RRIF and perhaps add to it as opportunities arise, and watch it grow.

Business meeting unites countries

JERUSALEM — An exciting and fruitful business conference was held recently in Jerusalem in which Israelis, Palestinians and representatives from Arab countries participated together for the first time.

They were joined by participants from Europe and the Unites States.

Initiated by Globes, an Israeli daily financial newspaper, sessions at the Jerusalem Business Conference included the following topics: The Middle East as a New International Business Center; Business Co-operation and Globalization; Tourism in an Era of Peace; and Advertising Breakthroughs in an Era of New Momentum in Communications.

The conference was chaired by Dan Gillerman, president of the Federation of Israeli Chambers of Commerce, who called for the formation of a Palestinian-Israeli Economic Council to foster regional co-operation "in order to raise the standard of living for all."

In his address to the two-day gathering, Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin urged the participants to "take advantage of the new atmosphere for co-operating in new economic realities between Israelis and Palestinians."

Economic News From Israel

Days Discovers Israel

ISRAEL — The hotel company that made budget lodging so popular in North America is bringing its formula for success to Israel.

Days Inn is planning five hotels over the next five years probably situated in Jerusalem, Tel Aviv, Tiberias, Eliat and either Netanya or Herziliya.

Days Inn hopes to create a Mid-East hotel chain covering Egypt, Jordan, Greece, Cyprus and Turkey.

Sun Signs

PETAH TIKVA — In a country that relies so heavily on the sun for electricity, it's not surprising to find an Israeli company selling solar powered highway signs.

Interplex Solar Ltd. has come up with a system to light up roadside messages using a special battery that is recharged during daylight hours by solar panels.

According to the company, the signs can be seen about half a mile away, which is more than double the range available through conventional lighting techniques.

More Immigrants, Less Unemployment

ISRAEL — Israel is basing its 1994 budget projections on 100,000 olim arriving in 1994.

The government is setting aside $3.7 billion (U.S.) for immigrant absorption which accounts for 8 per cent of all expenditures.

The government also forecasts a one percentage point drop in the unemployment rate to 10.2 per cent along with lower personal and corporate taxes.

Forum Attracts Business Elite

JERUSALEM — Many of the business world's rich and famous are heading for the Israeli Business Forum in Jerusalem later this month.

The guest list includes former Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau, now a Montreal lawyer; U.S. trade representative Mickey Kantor; executives from mega-corporations such as AT&T, General Electric and Merrill Lynch; and Peter Brooke, chairman of Advent, the world's largest venture capital company.

Although the ability to hobnob with the corporate commanders of North America is a definite attraction, making connections is what the Israeli Business Forum is all about. Israeli markets and companies from outside Israel are seeking innovative new products.

The Forum boasts a successful track record. One Israeli firm, Cubital, found several buyers for a computer system that transforms 3D images of a product into an actual plastic prototype.

This is the fourth Forum of its kind. It takes place from Feb. 28 - Mar. 2. United Jewish Appeal is sponsoring a business-oriented mission to Israel in conjunction with the Forum.

Diamonds Are Israel's Best Friend

ISRAEL — The Israeli diamond business is shining. Exports last year topped $3 billion, with demand expected to increase this year.

More than 70 per cent of the world's one to two carat cut diamonds come from Israel. The country is also a global leader for fancy cuts.

Rapid Transit for Tel Aviv

TEL AVIV — Despite Tel Aviv's actual size, population and traffic congestion, the city lacks a rapid transit system.

Egged and Dan, Israel's two largest bus companies, are joining together to build and operate a light rail system.

The first line, expected to open at the end of next year, will run from Tel Aviv to the southern suburb of Bat Yam.

The city was considering a subway line but the cost seems to be prohibitive.

Robots Anyone?

RAANANA — The robot business had proven lucrative to Robomatix, based in Raanana.

The company has just sold its sixth system to General Motors. This one is laser-based with four arms to cut car parts. The cost is $3.5 million.

No More Swiss Risks

SWITZERLAND — For years, the central bank of Switzerland had attached a sizeable cost to Swiss banks doing business with Israel.

All were required to set aside 30 per cent risk insurance if they deposited funds in or supplied credit to Israeli banks. That regulation has been lifted.

Israeli bankers believe the regulation's demise will lower the cost of raising capital in Swiss markets.

Fooling Fish

ISRAEL — Many of Israel's advanced agricultural branches are based on artificial irrigation and intensive cultivation.

These methods often stretch Mother Nature to the limit. Potted trees are tricked into dormancy in mid-summer through cold storage. Now, a kibbutz-based plastics firm has begun fooling fish into breeding in the dead of winter by raising them in greenhouses.

The artificial ponds built by Haogenplast begin with a particularly sturdy waterproof liner that prevents seepage. The special design means tanks can be assembled within days. Conventional ponds can take over a month to build.

The size of the artificial fish ponds varies from 1,000 square metres to large ponds with a capacity of tens of thousands of cubic meters. Fish farmers can cultivate fish at a ratio of 20 to 40 kilograms of fish per cubic meter of water.

These business briefs were compiled from information supplied by the Israel Economic Mission in Toronto, 961-1242.

Peace process gets boost

OTTAWA — The Middle East peace process received something of a boost last week, judging by where subsequent rounds of multilateral talks will take place.

Four of the next five rounds will be held in Arab countries, a sign of progress resulting from last week's secret talks of the multilateral steering group held at the Chateau Montebello resort near here.

Senior officials from Israel, Canada, Saudi Arabia, Russia, the U.S., Norway and other nations gathered for three days to map the future of the five working groups.

In what is being described as a sign of increasing speed of issue resolution, delegates set an ambitious agenda. Tunisia, Qatar, Oman, Morocco and Egypt will join the Netherlands in hosting future meetings. Delegates were unable to convince Syria and Lebanon to join the multilateral talks.

MISSING SOLDIER'S MOTHER VISITS OTTAWA

Miriam Baumel (centre), mother of missing Israeli soldier Zachary Baumel, met with MPs (from left) Joseph Volpe (Eglinton-Lawrence), Shaughnessy Cohen (Windsor-St. Clair), Mary Clancy (Halifax) and Dan McTeague (Ontario) during her recent visit to Ottawa. She asked them to use their influence to persuade her son's Syrian captors to release him and two other soldiers. See story, page 4.

Federation, JCC seek financial deal

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO —The Jewish Community Centre (JCC) and the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto (JFGT) have been involved in lengthy, ongoing negotiations in a bid to put the JCC's financial house in order and come up with a plan to pay off the centre's $10 million debt.

Proposals advanced in November by the JCC and the federation to the Bank of Montreal, which is owed the money, were not accepted, said Bernard Ghert, head of the JFGT. Following the rejection of the November proposals, the federation ended transfers of funds from the community's Endowment Fund to the JCC that were used to pay the interest on the bank debt. Altogether, $240,000 had been transferred from the fund between August and November, 1993.

Since that time, the JCC has been in arrears on interest payments. That means there is nothing to prevent the Bank of Montreal from calling in the loan and appointing a liquidator to sell off the JCC's assets to repay the money owing, Ghert said.

However, that prospect is unlikely, since "the bank loses, the JCC loses, everybody loses" in such a situation, he added.

Ghert said the federation decided it would not continue to assist the JCC pay its bank debt until some sort of new arrangement is made to ensure that the federation won't "face the same situation over again."

However, the JFGT has continued to allocate $75,000 per month to the JCC for a number of programs the centre runs on the community's behalf, he added.

The federation became involved in trying to help solve the JCC's financial difficulties because it "wants to see that the assets of the JCC are preserved for the broader community and the JCC remains a viable community entity," Ghert said.

JCC president David Perlmutter said the centre's debt is attributable primarily to money borrowed in the 1980s to expand the north branch on Bathurst Street. About $900,000 went towards the women's health club at the Bloor Street branch as well.

Perlmutter said the JCC is devising a financial plan that will put the organization on a sound financial basis, that will generate an operating surplus and take into account the centre's bank debt.

Vigil to back agunot set

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — From Vancouver to Halifax, hundreds — perhaps thousands — of Canadian Jews will mark the eve of the Fast of Esther by participating in an international Vigil for Agunot.

As part of the Year of the Agunah (1993/94), the International Coalition for Agunah Rights (ICAR), headed by Montreal scholar Norma Joseph, is urging the Jewish community to show its solidarity with agunot — women whose husbands refuse to give them a get (Jewish divorce).

The brief vigil — which will be held in Vancouver, Edmonton, Winnipeg, Hamilton, Toronto, Ottawa, Montreal and Halifax — will also take place in Israel. There may be additional vigils in smaller Canadian centres and in the United States.

"I feel that Judaism is at stake over this issue," Joseph told The CJN in a recent telephone interview. "Judaism is a just religion and this is not justice."

An agunah cannot remarry in accordance with Halachah (Jewish law). Should she remarry under civil law without obtaining a Jewish divorce, any children of that subsequent marriage are considered to be born of an adulterous relationship and are therefore mamzerim under Jewish law. Mamzerim, while halachically Jewish, are forbidden to marry nearly all other Jews. (If a man remarries without giving his first wife a get, any children of his second relationship are not considered mamzerim on the basis of their father's status.)

Only a husband can initiate a get. If a husband refuses to give his wife a get, she can never be divorced. If a wife refuses to accept the get, there are remedies under Jewish law, although it may be difficult to utilize them.

An amendment to Canada's Divorce Act four years ago has barred Jewish men in this country from using the get as a bargaining chip in civil proceedings to gain advantages such as possession of the family home or greater access to the children. For instance, one former agunah, whose case history is on file with ICAR, received her get only after her family mortgaged their home in order to pay her ex-husband $120,000.

"We are so fortunate in our country," ICAR vice-president Evelyn Brook said, explaining that many hours went into the writing of the amendment and that halachic needs were taken into consideration.

Joseph joins Brook in lauding Canada's Divorce Act, but cautions that not all lawyers know how to use it. The woman's lawyer must invoke the relevant section or it will not be used, she says. The law is also ineffective in cases in which the husband is living in another country, she notes, and cannot help people who obtained a civil divorce before August 1990.

"Ultimately we want to find ways of dealing with the problem that will work in every Jewish community," Joseph said.

ICAR, which was formed last year, grew out of the Montreal-based Canadian Coalition of Jewish Women for the Get. The coalition, originally co-chaired by Brook and Joseph, began as a subcommittee of the Status of Women committee of Canadian Jewish Congress Quebec region.

Now an independent, national organization chaired by Brook with Joseph acting as consultant, its member organizations include B'nai Brith Women, Emunah, Hadassah-WIZO, Na'amat, Canadian Women's ORT and the Montreal and Toronto Jewish Women's Federations. Both ICAR and the coalition are run by volunteers.

ICAR is now established in Canada, the United States and Israel. England, Australia and South Africa are "looking on with interest," said Joseph.

The goals of ICAR are threefold: to educate, to share information with other countries, and to work with rabbis on rabbinic ways of solving the problem.

The Rabbinical Council of America (RCA), an association of Orthodox rabbis in North America, passed a two-pronged resolution last summer, stating that its members would use prenuptial agreements to ensure participation in the get process should the marriage not work out; and that synagogues should take action such as denying membership or aliyot to people issued with a seruv (proclamation that they are in contempt of the Beit Din, or rabbinic court).

"On the surface, this looks wonderful," said Joseph. "The good thing is, a mainstream rabbinic group is saying that divorce is a problem and that we have to do something about it. Having worked on this issue for 20 years, I know that it took a long time to get the rabbinic world to agree that this is a problem. In the beginning, they would say, 'It's only one or two women; it's not such a problem'."

In fact, Israel alone has an estimated 10,000 agunot. The number of Canadian agunot is not known, although a 1987 B'nai Brith Canada study reported that there were 311 Canadian cases involving "conflict or disagreement in procurement of the get" between 1982 and 1985. Those were only the reported cases, emphasizes Toronto lawyer John Syrtash, an authority on the get issue.

Ottawa women bring Judaism to prison

By MIRIAM SOBEL
CJN Correspondent

OTTAWA — On the third day of Passover last year, four middle-aged Ottawa women loaded a car with turkey and tzimmes, chicken soup and kugel, and drove to Kingston for a memorable seder. They went to celebrate the Feast of Freedom with Jewish inmates at the Prison for Women.

It was the first seder ever celebrated at the penitentiary, and has been followed by a Rosh Hashanah dinner and a Chanukah party.

"I had never met a bunch of prisoners," says Alma Norman, one of the organizers and the woman who led the seder. "I had never been in a prison. And I thought to myself, 'these are women like the kind we are accustomed to meeting' ... I didn't expect them to be so socially gracious."

About 18 people sat down at the seder table including the three Jewish prisoners and their friends, the Ottawa women, and Marilyn Sheldon, the Jewish correctional officer who originally had the idea of bringing Jewish rituals to the prison.

The prison had a Christian Mass every Sunday and had regular visits from Muslim women. But there was nothing, says Sheldon, to meet the religious needs of the small Jewish prison community, of which she counts herself a member.

These were women who had grown up in Jewish homes, says Sheldon. They had gone to Hebrew school and synagogue, and had celebrated the holidays.

"These [Jewish] feelings haven't been abandoned," she says.

Sheldon bought Bibles. She got mezuzot for the Jewish inmates' doors. She started taking one of the inmates to synagogue every Saturday. Then she set to work planning a seder. Through a chain of contacts, the women from Ottawa were approached and agreed to prepare the dinner.

It was a great success. The seder lasted until almost midnight. The women sang songs, talked about their families and shared memories of past seders. If there were any barriers between the inmates and their guests, they fell away early.

"If I could make any statement, it is that an experience like this drives home the message that there are stereotypes and they're not real," says Goliger. "Everyone has lives and they are just as complicated as ours are."

Inmate Brandi Silverstein-Kerr praises the Ottawa women for being so warm and non-judgmental. "They treat us like people. They don't look at us in terms of what we're in for."

The most poignant moment of the night, recalls Norman, came when it was time for everyone to head home. "We had to wait, all of us from Ottawa, while all the prisoners were counted. They went through a door that clanged behind them, then they all turned around and waved. They were in prison and we were going back to our car in the parking lot."

The Ottawa women decided they would return in autumn to celebrate Rosh Hashanah. This time, the inmates insisted on preparing the meal themselves. The guests arrived at the prison to find the gym set up like a banquet hall. There was linen on the tables, fresh flowers at every place

Jewish woman fights effects of Chernobyl caused cancer

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A young Jewish woman with cancer caused by the Chernobyl explosion is fighting for her life with the help of doctors and technicians at Sunnybrook hospital.

Alla Medvedskaia, 21, came to Canada after clinicians in her native Moldovia (between Romania and Ukraine) said resources were needed for native Moldovians, not for Jews.

"I was told, 'Go to Israel, go to America, go to Canada,' " she said.

So Alla came to Canada on a visitor's visa last May (the money for her air fare was raised in her hometown of Beltsy by Jews and non-Jews) and, through intercessions by people at many levels, she is receiving expensive medical care and chemotherapy treatments under OHIP.

One event that lifted her spirits was the delivery to her hospital bed by lawyer Stephen Soloway, Mendel Green's associate, of a decision by the Immigration and Refugee Board granting her status as a legitimate refugee.

Green's firm did not charge any legal fees.

Alla, who has Hodgkin's disease, wears a wig to cover the hair lost through treatment. She was exposed to radiation from the Chernobyl blast in Ukraine in April, 1986, when she was 14. "At the time we were told it was a fire and not serious," she said.

Her father, a microbiologist, had been posted near Kiev. Lumps in her lungs did not show up until three years later. Even then, no one treating her associated the cancer with the Chernobyl explosion, though one of her friends, also afflicted, has since died.

Dr. Peter Zubkov and Dr. M. Jane Pritchard, who examined her soon after her arrival in Canada, say without continued treatment her life expectancy could be a matter of months.

Alla has completed her second series of a six-day chemotherapy treatment with a more powerful drug than used in her previous treatment. According to one of her friends, musician Michael Khinkis, Alla will need to have her own bone marrow removed and later replanted, owing to the side effects of this drug. Even though a donor for the marrow will not be needed, Kinkhis said the operation will not be done at the Toronto General Hospital until August because of a backlog.

Alla Medvedskaia

At this time, Alla's fervent hope is that her mother, Nina, 43, can join her. Though she was first refused a visa at the Canadian Embassy in Bucharest, new information sent by the Green law firm has cleared the way, and if $1,000 can be raised for her ticket, she will be on the way.

"Alla's mother is nervous that she will get here too late, Alla is her only child," Khinkis said. Her mother does not intend to apply to stay in Canada, he said.

Among those standing by Alla are her friends Nina, Vladimir, Marina and Lilia Reznik of North York, and Khinkis' fellow musicians in the Dynasty Star band which plays in the well-known night club of that name.

Aside from the medical and hospital expenses which are covered, and the welfare payments which Alla receives, her friends have helped her with the costs of a special diet and the taxis needed to take her to hospital. Since July she has stayed in hospital for 10 weeks. She is out of hospital at the moment, recovering from the last treatment series.

Anyone wishing to help should contact Sound Entertainment Company, 5900 Yonge St., Apt. 105, North York, M2M 3T8, (416) 590-9119.

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Maybe it was something percolating in the mindset of U.S. citizens at the time, but even as a young girl in Cleveland Heights, Cherie Brown felt she had a mission to help bring diverse groups together.

Brown was only 10 years old when at the height of the Civil Rights movement, she and her B'nai Brith Girls chapter ventured into the city's black community in the hope of building bridges between blacks and Jews. A disturbing trend was developing in which whites vacated their neighborhoods as blacks moved in, and Brown was determined to oppose it.

Since that time (and in the wake of the success of that early mission), Brown has devoted her professional and student life to helping bridge the gaps between communities.

As a Hillel student at UCLA in the mid-1960s, she helped set up support groups for the Black Panthers and she convinced the Jewish federation in Los Angeles to provide grants to work towards establishing black-Jewish ties.

CIC re-organization urged

Board members will serve ad personam

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A task force of the Council of Jewish Federations of Canada (CJF Canada) has recommended a series of changes to the governance of the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC), which are intended to divorce the organization from domestic communal organizations.

Under the proposals advanced by the task force and accepted recently by the board of CJF Canada, the board of directors of the CIC will shift away from the constituent organizations to a group of individuals "reconstituted on an ad personam basis, inclusive and properly representative of the composition of the Canadian Jewish community, its principal organizations and interests."

The officers have also been asked to "rewrite a draft CIC constitution ... particularly setting down a clear mandate" and "propose operating guidelines" for the reconstituted organization, said Daniel Pekarsky, chair of the CIC.

The recommendations for a revamped CIC are "part of a continuing process that encompasses all the national organizations," said CJF Canada president George Wasserstein.

CJF Canada is an umbrella organization whose constituent members include the country's federated and unfederated communities, Canadian Jewish Congress, Jewish Immigrant Aid Services, United Israel Appeal (UIA) and CIC. Its mandate is to serve as the vehicle for planning, promoting and co-ordinating nationally-supported Jewish community services.

Wasserstein said that CJF Canada has been examining national Jewish organizations like CIC, JIAS and student groups, with an eye to enhancing their effectiveness in serving the community.

The CIC was established to make representations to government and the media on Canada-Israel matters, on behalf of the Canadian Jewish Community. Its founding members included Congress, B'nai Brith Canada and the Canadian Zionist Federation (CZF). About two years ago, several other organizations were added to the list of constituent groups, including the UIA and the federated communities of Toronto and Montreal.

Wasserstein said, "Our concern was that the structure of CIC was not conducive to the most effective organizational structure, and what we are doing here is restructuring CIC so it can be a more effective organization and still be representative of the community at large."

Pekarsky said that in his three years at the head of CIC, the most difficult task he had was at the organizational level, chairing meetings of an organization that had no constitution and which included six organizations with different interests.

In recent years, the community has seen both Congress and B'nai Brith acting alone in setting up high profile meetings with figures linked to the Middle East. B'nai Brith met with Jordan's King Hussein during the monarch's visit to Canada, while Congress met recently with the ambassadors of Morocco and Jordan. Both organizations met independently with representatives of the domestic Palestinian community.

Gabe Nachman, president of B'nai Brith Canada, said he was unhappy with the task force's recommendations: "It seems the federations, through CJF Canada, are trying to get an enhanced role. It looks to me that one organization (CJF Canada) is trying to take a greater leadership role and reduce the role of the other groups, like B'nai Brith and the CZF."

Nachman said the result will be that the CIC will "lose out on our expertise."

CZF president Kurt Rothschild, reached by telephone in Israel, said "we hope [the proposals] lead to better co-ordination" between various pro-Israel groups. "We don't want the government approached from three different angles. We want to present a strong and cohesive aproach to government so the community appears unified."

Rothschild said that in the past, "organizatons were undertaking meetings that weren't sufficiently coordinated with the CIC."

Evelyn Katz, past president of Winnipeg's Jewish federation and a member of the CJF Canada task force, said "my understanding is that the operations of the CIC were hampered by internal dissensions."

The recommendations, she continued, adopted the point of view that "it was best to let the CIC stand alone with board members who were there individually, taking a global, community-wide point of view and not that of the constituent groups."

Congress president Irving Abella said CJF Canada has taken the view that it is best to divide Israel-advocacy from domestic Jewish community advocacy. Congress will continue its community-based work, in which it meets with non-governmental organizations, church groups, politicians and others to promote an appreciation for Israel's situation, he said.

Abella said he hopes the changes to CIC will lead to greater consultation with other pro-Israel advocacy groups, adding he did not expect to see any changes in the way Congress promotes Israel's interests.

Nachman said that while the CJF is suggesting the proposals will enhance consultation among pro-Israel domestic organizations, "I see no indications that enhance coordination."

Nachman said he would like to see CIC continue in its current form.

Legion headcover ruling gets support

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — B'nai Brith Canada's (BBC) League for Human Rights last week called on provincial commands to respect a national Royal Canadian Legion directive to allow religious head coverings, including turbans and kippot, in Legion halls.

In Ottawa, BBC's director of government relations, Ian Kagedan, met last week with representatives of the World Sikh Organization to plan "a variety of interventions" on the still-smouldering issue of religious headgear in Legion facilities.

Some of these are reminding local Legion branches that even though they have some independence from headquarters, the national directive should be followed because "it's up to the community to decide what is religious headgear and what isn't. It's not for others to judge," Kagedan told The CJN.

Last November, the Royal Canadian Legion's Dominion Command approved a national policy requiring Legions to admit members and guests wearing "the religious headdress of the Jewish and Sikh faiths," which are "not considered to constitute headdress in the traditional sense."

That ruling followed several incidents last fall in which Sikh war veterans wearing turbans were barred from entering Legion halls. Local officials cited rules disallowing entry to anyone whose head is covered, in deference to fallen comrades, the Queen and any woman present.

In a statement, League national chair Stephen Scheinberg found it "especially troubling" that attitudes of "intolerance or worse appear to be displayed in the banning of religious head coverings in various Legion branches.

"Jewish men whose religious observance requires their wearing a skullcap, or kippah, and Sikh men whose tradition mandates the wearing of a turban are two groups who are victims of such exclusionary action."

The focus in the past few months "has been on the most visible example" of religious headgear, namely, turbans, Hogan explained.

The issue of turbans in Legion halls will be voted on at a national council meeting in Calgary in May. In the meantime, some Legion branches across the country have questioned whether to obey the interim national directive.

Sikh veterans barred

"If it's voted down [in May], we're back to square one. If it's accepted, then all branches are bound by it." And if individual Legion branches disobey an approved directive, their charters can be revoked and they can be shut down, Hogan noted.

He said that of the country's 1,750 Legion branches, "only three or four are acting up."

"Many" of Canada's 585,000 Legionnaires don't consider a kippah or turban as the same kind of religious head covering, "but we [the Dominion Command] do," Hogan stressed.

Last Remembrance Day five Sikh veterans of the Indian army were invited to take part in a parade and then barred from entering a Legion hall in Surrey, B.C., because they wore turbans.

Just last week in Cornwall, Ont., the president of the local Legion, who had made controversial statements about Sikhs, was reinstated.

Angelo Lebano was suspended by the provincial command in December after telling a local newspaper: "If they [Sikh veterans] feel they have to wear their turbans, let them go back to their country and do what they want to do."

Also in December, Rabbi Reuven Bulka of Ottawa, the chaplain of the Dominion Command, wrote an opinion piece stating "no one wearing a turban or a yarmulke upon entry into a Legion Hall does so out of disrespect for Legion tradition."

The turban issue has not been a burning one for the Jewish War Veterans of Canada, which claims between 900 and 1,000 members.

National Commander Sam Pasternack told The CJN his group has issued invitations to all Sikh veterans wearing turbans that "they are more than welcome" to join the activities of the Jewish War Veterans.

Pasternack said he would like to ask Legion members who oppose turbans, "Would they ask the Pope or a cardinal to remove their headdress?"

Veterans who belong to the so-called Jewish Legion halls, like Toronto's General Wingate Branch, have never had a problem wearing kippot, Pasternack added.

Canadian Jewish Congress has also acted on the issue, having sent out letters and statements to Legion officials calling the banning of turbans "outrageous and discriminatory."

"They've given us their commitment that turbans will be allowed," said CJC's Bernie Farber last week. "We'll wait and see."

Missing Israeli soldier's mom explains her case to MPs

By MIRIAM SOBEL
CJN Correspondent

OTTAWA — Miriam Baumel, mother of an Israeli soldier missing in action for 11 years, met with Canadian parliamentarians last week to ask them to use their influence to persuade her son's captors to release him and two other soldiers.

Zachary Baumel, Zvi Feldman and Yehuda Katz disappeared after a battle in northern Lebanon on June 11, 1982. Later that night, according to several press reports, Israeli soldiers were paraded aboard their captured tank down the streets of the Syrian capital, Damascus. The families of the young men have heard nothing of them since.

Baumel, who moved to Israel with her husband and children in 1970, has been lobbying for information about the soldiers for 11 years.

"We feel that they're alive," said Baumel in an interview. "We feel very encouraged by people we have contact with in the Arab world."

She said progress in the Israel-PLO peace negotiations had renewed her hope that the MIAs would be returned.

In December, the Baumels received one half of their son's army dog tag after it was delivered to Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin by a PLO emissary. Although it came with no explanation, the gesture confirmed Baumel's belief that Yassar Arafat has information about the soldiers.

Baumel is now contacting Western governments to ask them to raise the issue with Syria, where the men were last seen, and with Arafat when he comes for an official visit. She recently met with members of the U.S. Congress who had visited Syria to look into the matter.

"The MIA issue is something the whole western world should be concerned about," said Baumel. "We're going into the 21st century now, and man is supposed to have learned that there are certain things that you don't do. Murder is taboo and kidnapping is taboo."

In Ottawa, Toronto Liberal MP Joseph Volpe (Eglinton-Lawrence), hosted a lunch for Baumel, which was attended by almost two dozen sympathetic MPs. Later, in a statement made at the beginning of Question Period, Volpe urged the Minister of Foreign Affairs to raise the issue with Arafat and Syrian authorities "so as to make the return of the MIAs part of the peace package."

Canadian Jewish Congress has taken up the cause of the MIAs, including a fourth soldier, Ron Vered, who disappeared in 1986.

Moshe Ronen, chair of the Israel affairs committee for Canadian Jewish Congress, said it would be to Arafat's advantage to see that the MIA issue is resolved.

"You cannot be sincere about peace and allow a situation like this to continue," said Ronen.

"One of the views of the people who were opposed to the peace plan was that Arafat could not be trusted," he added. "Action on this particular issue will show his sincerity, particularly if there is no price [such as a demand for an exchange of Palestinian prisoners]. He would score a lot of points with public opinion and with governments."

The MIA situation will be a priority for Canadian Jewish Congress, he said, and will be raised at all political meetings with government leaders and officials.

Baumel said she was grateful for the support she found in Ottawa, but says she will wait, as she has waited for over a decade, to see if it does any good.

"I've been at this 11 1/2 years. I've been too encouraged and then disappointed, and then the opposite. So I just take what comes."

Soviet Christian family facing deporation to Israel

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A Christian family, originally from the former Soviet Union, is facing deportation to Israel after having exhausted the legal means to stay in Canada, despite a wave of support from the people of Quebec City.

The family has attracted public attention because Olga Davidov, who is fluent in French, has worked as an interpreter for the Russian players on the Quebec Nordiques team of the National Hockey League, and her 21-year-old son Igor has gained fame in amateur boxing.

Over 8,000 signatures — many of them from hockey fans — were collected on a petition asking the Canadian government to allow the family to stay here. Besides Olga, 42, and Igor, there is her husband Valery, also 42, and another son, Oleg, 13.

They have also received support from the city council of Ste. Foy, the suburb in which they live, and from Bloc Quebecois Member of Parliament for Louis Hebert, Philippe Pare. The Quebec City media has featured their plight prominently.

Nordiques public relations director Richard Thibault said Davidov is a valued and well-liked employee, and Quebecers are sympathetic because they are delighted to see immigrants who have integrated so well, including speaking French.

"The Nordiques have been doing everything they can to help the family stay," Thibault said.

An important part of her duties was helping the three Russian players on the Nordiques and their families adjust to life in a city unlike any other in North America.

The Davidovs left their native Tajikistan in Central Asia, now an autonomous republic, in late 1990 when a civil war was being waged. On the strength of false papers identifying Olga as Jewish, the family emigrated to Israel where they lived for over a year and received citizenship.

They came to Canada in February, 1992 as visitors and claimed refugee status, which was denied. In December, Federal Court refused to hear their appeal of the refugee board decision.

As a last resort, they sought to be reassessed as potential immigrants from within Canada on humanitarian grounds. Earlier this month, an immigration officer in Quebec City turned them down.

Richard St. Louis, an immigration department spokesman in Montreal, said the Davidovs have been served with a "conditional departure notice." If they do not comply within 30 days, they will receive a deportation order, he said.

The only route that may still be open to them is intervention by Immigration Minister Sergio Marchi, who can use his discretion to overturn departmental decisions, St. Louis said.

Davidov was not saying much to the media immediately after the negative ruling, except that she was "completely shocked and very upset." She had earlier told a Quebec newspaper that if she was expelled it would be "worse than a heart attack."

In interviews with Quebec City papers, Davidov has said the family felt they could not fit into Israel because it is a Jewish state and, if Canada deported them to Israel, she feared Israel would send them back to Tajikistan, now controlled by Islamic fundamentalists. Igor also said he is worried he will be sent to jail for failing to fulfill his army service while they were in Israel.

But, Israeli Consul General Itzhak Levanon stressed the Davidovs have nothing to fear if they must return to Israel. "The doors are open to them, as they are to any Israeli citizen abroad...There is no chance they will de deported [to Tajikistan]."

No reprisals or interrogation will be taken against the Davidovs even if they did enter Israel under false pretenses, he said. Levanon noted that 18 per cent of Israel's population is not Jewish.

"Israel is a democratic, pluralistic society where everyone has the right to express themselves," he said. "They have Israeli passports, Israeli citizenship and therefore all the privileges and obligations of any citizen. That includes the right to leave the country."

As for Igor's fear of being charged with desertion, Levanon said the military authorities judge each case on its individual circumstances, adding that many Israelis return from abroad who did not fulfill their army duty and few are imprisoned.

"Israel may not meet their preferences, but I don't think they should bash Israel," he said.

Davidov, who lived with her family on a kibbutz near the Golan, is reported to have said: "Maybe [Israel] is excellent for Jews, but for non-Jews it is unbearable."

They felt they were not accepted because of their nationality and religion.

Changes in hate laws prompt appeal of Keegstra conviction

Christie cites Canadian, American decisions

By JUDY SHAPIRO
Jewish Free Press

CALGARY — Recent advances and changes in law have made statutes prohibiting hatred against an identifiable group unconstitutional, lawyer Doug Christie told the Alberta Court of Appeal this month, in asking the court to overturn the 1992 conviction of Jim Keegstra for promoting hatred against Jews.

In 1990, the Supreme Court of Canada ruled that laws against promoting hatred are a justifiable limit to free speech and are constitutional, Christie noted.

"The law has evolved since Keegstra was before the Supreme Court of Canada," Christie told reporters outside the courtroom.

He cited the Supreme Court of Canada's decision overturning the conviction of Toronto pro-Nazi publisher Ernst Zundel for spreading false news about the Holocaust.

That decision, although relating to a different law, placed freedom of speech "in ambiguity" and redefined what limits governments can put on free speech, Christie said.

"When the foundation of a judgment has been removed ... it would seem naive to pretend that judgment stands inviolate.

"Law does advance and does change."

Christie also pointed to a U.S. Supreme Court decision that hate laws are unconstitutional.

The American ruling is relevant here, Christie told the court, because the Supreme Court of Canada considered the U.S. experience in rendering its judgement on Keegstra in 1990.

"It would seem strange that 250 million people on one side of an imaginary line could express an opinion but 28 million people on the other side ... could not express the same opinion," Christie said.

A former mayor and high school teacher from Eckville, Alta., Keegstra, 57, has been in and out of courts for almost a decade.

He's accused of promoting hatred by teaching that the Holocaust was a hoax perpetrated by an international Jewish conspiracy.

A 1985 conviction against him for promoting hatred was overturned on appeal. The Supreme Court of Canada later upheld the constitutionality of the law but the Alberta Court of Appeal ordered a new trial.

In the second trial in 1992, Keegstra was again convicted, and fined $3,000. Although he defended himself, Keegstra hired Christie, who has also represented Zundel and accused Nazi war criminal Imre Finta, to present his appeal.

The constitutional argument was among several presented by Christie in trying to convince the court to set aside Keegstra's 1992 conviction. He also argued:

- That the legal definitions of terms such as hate, religion, public interest and public benefit are too vague. Christie argued that the first trial judge did not clarify these terms for the jury.
- A person cannot be convicted of wilfully promoting hate if it can be proven it was done in the public interest. Christie said Keegstra's beliefs were sincerely held and that discussion of them was in the public interest.

Crown lawyer Jack Watson countered: "What public interest could be served by this appalling tidal wave of propaganda?"

- That the Crown failed to prove Jews are an identifiable group.
- That the trial judge erred in admitting students' notes into evidence and in directions on Keegstra's ability to introduce testimony from his first trial as evidence.
- That the trial judge erred in denying a request from the jury for transcripts of a witness's testimony and for a copy of the Criminal Code section under which Keegstra was charged.

Watson told the court that even if it is ruled the lower court judge made a mistake in denying these requests, it would not justify ordering a retrial. An error such as this, in fact, worked in Keegstra's favor, he said.

The appeal court justices reserved judgment after the two-day hearing.

Lawyers said it could take months before a ruling is reached.

Keegstra also faces a Crown appeal of the $3,000 fine levied in 1992. But that won't be heard until after a ruling is reached on his appeal.

'Schindler Jew' Page hopes film will discourage Nazism

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — The man who persuaded novelist Thomas Keneally to write the story of Oskar Schindler said he is appalled by the existence of groups promoting hatred between races.

Leopold Page described hatred as "the world's biggest sickness."

Page, a Schindlerjude (Schindler's Jew), told The CJN in an interview here that he thinks there is more race hatred now than before World War II and blamed it on a "force" paying racists to teach hatred against Jews, blacks, Catholics and others.

Page was in Vancouver to speak to the Jewish community under the auspices of the Holocaust Centre Society, the Jewish Community Centre and Poland's consulate. More than 800 people attended.

He said those who have experienced the tragedy of the Holocaust must teach younger people more compassion, love and understanding between races and religions.

"A child is born to love, not to hate," he said. "Hatred is taught by evil forces."

Page, 81, hopes Schindler's List, which he describes as a documentary by witnesses of the Holocaust, will help to discourage those attempting to revive Nazism. It's one way of trying to offset the abuse of human rights "which nobody else is doing anything about."

The youthful-looking Page, a former Jewish high school teacher in Cracow and a Polish army officer, survived the war with his wife Mila thanks to Schindler. He said he always wanted someone to write the Schindler story.

One day in 1980, a young man walked into Page's leather goods store in Beverly Hills looking for a new briefcase. He introduced himself as Thomas Keneally, an Australian writer. In the 45 minutes it took to clear his credit card, Page summarized the Schindler story and asked Keneally to write it.

Keneally demurred, saying he was only 3 when World War II broke out and had been taught very little in history classes about the Holocaust.

Page told the author young writers were supposed to record for the world the stories of survivors before they all died. He insisted it be a documentary, not a novel, and obtained releases from 150 survivors (Page insists on calling them witnesses).

Leopold Page

Keneally wrote what turned out to be a best seller in 14 languages — including Hebrew. The book sold best in Israel. Schindler's List also won the Booker Prize for literature in 1982.

Following the book's publication, the movie rights were sold to MCA-Universal. Steven Spielberg was pegged to make the film, but said he couldn't do it for 10 years.

Page was disappointed because he was 70. "Who knew if I'd live to see the movie made?" He was very much alive when Spielberg started production in February 1992. Page served as a technical advisor.

He told The CJN that Spielberg didn't take "a penny" for doing the $23-million movie and that the money will go instead to charity. Some of the beneficiaries will be the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, the Anti-Defamation League, the Holocaust Museum in Washington, D.C., the Hebrew University School of Holocaust Studies and Yad Vashem. A premiere will be held in Israel in March.

Much of the picture was shot at Dachau and near Cracow during the winter. Page said actors and the thousands of local residents who worked as extras performed in ragged, skimpy clothes despite the sub-zero temperatures to portray camp conditions. One woman told him "I don't care if they pay me for this. I want to feel what your people felt when they lived through the Holocaust."

Schindler, who was a member of the Nazi party, was able to operate his factory, which made utensils for the army, by bribing the top Nazi brass and thus was able to pick his own slave labor. For some reason, he chose Jews and tried to keep Jewish families together.

Schindler got Page's wife out of Auschwitz to join her husband, who was repairing cars for the Nazis. Page said the Nazis didn't object to Schindler using Jews because the factory couldn't be sabotoged to hurt the war effort. Schindler's Jews were all confined to a camp, however, to keep the Nazis satisfied.

Once, when Schindler was running out of bribe money and needed supplies, one of his workers forged a certificate to get what he needed. The "forger" went to Israel after the war and became a top judge who retired recently, said Page.

After the war, Schindler was broke but didn't want to go back to Germany, where he might be considered a traitor. He couldn't get into the U.S. because he was a member of the Nazi party. With the help of his Schindlerjuden, he went to Argentina where he died in 1974. His was buried with honors in a Catholic cemetery in Israel.

His widow still lives in Argentina and Page said "she is well taken care of" by Jewish organizations. While Schindler was alive, the Jews he had saved contributed one day's pay a year to help him.

Page said he never kept records about his time with Schindler, relying only on his memory. "Don't forget," he said, "I was a professor and an army officer and we were trained to observe. That's how I could recall everything for Keneally. In any event, most of us who were Schindlerjuden tried to keep in touch after liberation."

In all, said Page, Schindler saved about 1,500 Jews — 600 women and 900 men, including boys and girls. At least three of Schindler's Jews live in Vancouver.

The night of the speech, Vancouver MLA Tom Perry presented a cheque for $25,000 to the Vancouver Holocaust Centre Society to buy computer equipment for the 4,000-sq. ft. Holocaust centre opening in November. The centre will cost $500,000. Most of the money has been raised.

MP quotes Hitler in newsletter

KELOWNA, B.C. — Werner Schmidt, the Reform MP for Okanagan Centre, says he is "dismayed" that a newsletter produced by Reform riding association members here contained a quotation by Adolf Hitler.

In a press release issued through his Kelowna riding office, Schmidt said: "I want to clarify any misunderstanding that the newsletter originated in either my Ottawa or Kelowna parliamentary office. This was not a Parliament newsletter." He added that "such a distasteful reference should never have been made in a Reform Party publication and I will be taking steps to ensure that such a situation does not occur again."

The newsletter, dated January 1994, has the Reform logo at the top of the page in large type, and it gives the Reform Party association office as part of the address. It is a single sheet carrying a message from Schmidt describing his first week as an MP and his impressions of Parliament.

The newsletter came to the attention of Anita Nadler, president of the Okanagan Jewish Community, who said she was very upset Schmidt would cite words by a man responsible for killing six million Jews, and she immediately expressed her anger to the local media.

The Hitler quotation is a filler and comes under the heading of More Famous Quotes: "What luck for rulers that men do not think." There is also a quotation by Abba Eban.

Miles Novak, local executive assistant to Schmidt, denied all knowledge of the newsletter's contents before it appeared. He said it was prepared by a committee of the riding association and the quote was inserted by the editor, whom Novak would not identify.

In his view, said Novak, the Hitler quote was not meant to glorify the Nazi leader but rather meant as a warning that citizens must monitor politicians to avoid giving power to leaders such as Hitler.

Renee Switzer Bellas, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress, Pacific region, said a quotation such as the one used in the MP's newletter was offensive to all Canadians. Hal Joffe, Congress national community relations chair, called the newsletter insensitive and demanded an apology by the MP to Canadians.

In his release, Schmidt said that, while he had contributed the article to the newsletter, he did not see the publication before it was distributed. He said he was offended to see the quotation from "that man" and that he shared "the repugnance felt by others."

A letter to Reform Party leader Preston Manning from B'nai Brith Canada executive vice president, Frank Dimant, also expressed dismay at the Okanagan Centre newsletter and called for assurances that there would be no repetition of "such displays of insensitivitiy and poor taste."

While expressing appreciation of Manning's "quick denunciation of the use of the offending quote and ...of Schmidt's distancing himself from the riding associations publication," Dimant urged Manning: "We seek your assurance that your efforts continue to exclude from involvement in your party any individuals who espouse racist and bigoted views."

Racism worse elsewhere, German Jewish leader says

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Last week, a court in Wuppertal, Germany sentenced two skinheads and a bartender to jail terms ranging from eight years to 14 years for kicking and burning to death a man they mistakenly believed was Jewish.

That crime was one in a series of incidents in recent years in which German radicals have lashed out at minorities.

Yet despite that horrific crime and other incidents of neo-Nazi violence in Germany, Ignatz Bubis remains sanguine about the future of the Jews of Germany.

Bubis, president of the board of directors of the Central Council of Jews in Germany, believes that while the media focuses on his home country, the problem of racism is substantially worse in other European states.

In Germany, he said, only about eight per cent of the vote goes to the Republican and other extremist parties while in Austria, rightist radicals have garnered 18 per cent of the vote. In France, rightist Jean-Marie Le Pen can count on support from 15 per cent of the population while in Belgium, the extremist Flemish Front gets 12 per cent of the vote.

Furthermore, all of Germany's mainstream parties have gone on record stating they will not enter into a coalition government with extremist parties, Bubis said.

A businessman based in Berlin, Bubis was in Toronto recently to deliver a lecture to the Jewish studies program at the University of Toronto on right wing radicalism and the Jewish community of Germany.

the rest of Europe and even North America, is experiencing a growing trend of racist propaganda, much of it originating with Toronto neo-Nazi Ernst Zundel.

Polls in Germany show that 15 per cent of the population admits to being openly anti-Semitic while another 15 per cent has latent anti-Semitic attitudes, Bubis said. This finding, he continued, has nothing to do with the reunification of Germany but is part of a continent-wide trend of right-wing growth.

The Jewish community in Germany, which numbers about 44,000, hasn't experienced the kind of assaults targeted against foreigners, who, with numbers approaching six and a half million, are much more visible, he said. Nevertheless, there were more than 80 desecrations of Jewish cemeteries in both 1992 and 1993, he pointed out.

While that sort of incident is roundly condemned by public figures, "90 per cent of politicians from all parties are saying there are too many refugees" in Germany, he said.

Turning to the Jewish community's internal problems, Bubis said its numbers have exploded since 1989, when there were only 29,000 in both East and West Germany. Since then, 15,000 Jews from the former Soviet Union have arrived.

The federal government is doing its part in helping them integrate into German life while the Jewish community is helping by teaching them German as well as giving them a grounding in Jewish history and culture. In addition, the community in Frankfurt has turned over 150 apartments to the recent arrivals, Bubis said.

The more established Jewish community, which consists primarily of emigres from Eastern Europe who arrived after the war, is facing a shortage of German-speaking relgious teachers and rabbis, he said.

Still, the country's three main centres of Jewish life each boast some Jewish educational facilities.

Berlin, home to 10,000 Jews, has a day school that provides education from kindergarten through high school.

Frankfurt, with 6,000 Jews, has a day school through the elementary level, while Munich, home to 5,000 Jews, provides Jewish education up to Grade 4. There are kindergartens in both Dusseldorf and Cologne, he said.

Asked why Jews remain in Germany at a time when racists are becoming bolder, Bubis replied: "I don't want to say I'm comfortable and we have no problems. But I expect everyone will fight these problems where they live."

Students explore peace at WUJS seminar in Israel

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

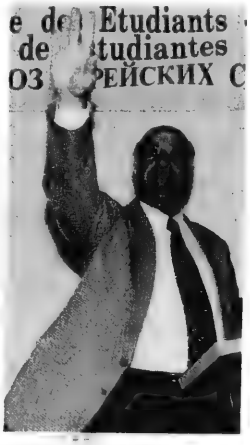
TORONTO — "My perspective [on the peace process] hasn't changed, but my understanding of it has," says York University student Andrea Silverstone, 20, reflecting on her recent participation in the World Union of Jewish Students' (WUJS) annual winter seminar.

Silverstone, who is vice-president of WUJS and chair of Network Canada (WUJS' Canadian affiliate), was one of four Canadians attending the seminar. Michelle Brown and Simon Rucker of Toronto, and Bram Portnoy, a Montrealer studying in Israel, also attended. Over 100 students representing Jewish student unions worldwide participated in the seminar.

This year's meeting, held on a moshav near Jerusalem, featured a wide range of speakers — from Arab Democratic Party MK Abdul Wahab Darawshe to Yoram Chazoni, aide to Likud leader Binyamin Netanyahu — focusing on the theme What's Peace Got to Do With It?

Darawshe told WUJS students that he and his party are "striving for better co-existence between Arabs and Jews everywhere. [There is now] real hope for a comprehensive and just peace in the region," he said, adding that "nobody can prevent an eventual solution of a Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza Strip." He also spoke of the possibility of an eventual Common Market of the Middle East.

Darawshe attacked Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin for his "attempts to redefine 'the Jericho area'," but repeated his desire to enter the government's coalition.



Arab MK Abdul Wahab Darawshe

After hearing about a dozen speakers on the peace process, Silverstone doesn't believe that "absolute extremes" can find common ground. "I think the [moderates] will set the line, and the [others] will toe it." Although she says she is somewhat pessimistic (the situation is "so explosive"), Silverstone told The CJN she believes that peace can be achieved.

Brown, 23, who is co-chair of Network's gender issues task force, was disappointed that women were underrepresented as speakers at the seminar. (Silverstone, who was involved in planning the agenda, explained that an effort was made to invite women speakers, and that most Israeli politicians are male.) Naomi Chazan, Meretz party MK, was one of the few women speakers.

Brown appreciated the effort made to present a rounded picture of the peace process, particularly in having an Arab point of view. Palestinian journalist and senior media adviser to the Palestinian peace accord delegation Doued Kuttab also spoke at the seminar.

At the request of Australian-born WUJS chair David Gold, Darawshe promised to raise the subject of Israeli MIAs on all appropriate occasions. Prior to Darawshe's speech Miriam Baumel, mother of missing soldier Zachary Baumel, had made an impassioned plea to the students to help her in the campaign to locate her son.

Network Canada is launching its own MIA campaign, which will be the focus of its annual lobby day next month when students travel to Ottawa to meet with federal politicians regarding issues of concern to them.

Network, formed in 1977, has a double mandate of activism and bringing students closer to their Jewish identity, Silverstone said.

WUJS was founded in 1924 by a small group of students including Albert Einstein to fight anti-Semitism on European campuses and provide a strong voice for Jewish student concerns.

Clinton addresses WJC meeting

CJC president meets head of Sarajevo Jewish community

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — U.S. President Bill Clinton had already finished addressing an international conference of Jewish delegates last Wednesday when he returned to the podium with a stunning announcement.

After months of difficult negotiations, Israel and the PLO had just reached agreement on the implementation of the self-rule accord they had signed at the White House last September, the president said.

Delegates of the World Jewish Congress were momentarily speechless at the news, which had broken during the course of Clinton's speech to the group in the Old Executive Office Building. But after a brief silence, the group erupted into a thunderous round of applause.

Clinton called the agreement "a milestone," and then stepped down from the podium to shake hands with delighted delegates.

"This was an extraordinary end to a conference; the announcement of near peace in the Middle East," said Elan Steinberg, executive director of the World Jewish Congress.

The address by Clinton and one by Vice-President Al Gore capped a WJC conference that also included meetings with Secretary of State Warren Christopher and members of Congress.

After Clinton's speech, both he and Gore waded into the delegates and chatted briefly with Abella and others.

"Mostly, we talked about Bosnia, what can be done and ought to be done to lift the siege of Sarajevo," Abella told The CJN on his return.

He said Clinton and Gore appeared "sincere and dedicated."

Abella also spoke to Ivan Ceresnjes, head of Sarajevo's Jewish community, who expressed support for NATO's deadline against Bosnian Serb gunners around the city but, according to Abella, is concerned that if Bosnian Muslims are armed, those arms could later be used against other ethnic groups.

Abella later addressed a plenary session on Jewish continuity, while Cotler appeared before a special House Foreign Affairs subcommittee that heard testimony on anti-Semitism.

The biannual gathering of the WJC's governing board attracted delegates from Jewish communities around the world, including those in the newly independent states of the former Soviet Union and Sarajevo.

In his speech, Clinton discussed a range of topics, including Bosnia, ethnic hatred, the Middle East peace process and religious freedom.

The president congratulated Gore for speaking out against anti-Semitism and bigotry around the world. "People must realize and move beyond antiquated beliefs" of hatred and racism, he said.

Clinton said his administration has worked "very hard to build a just and lasting peace in the Middle East."

He then outlined three of the administration's goals with respect to that peace: minimizing the risks being taken by Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, helping with implementation of the self-rule accord and encouraging progress in Israel's negotiations with the other Arab parties.

The president also repeated his call for the abolition of the Arab economic boycott of Israel, which he said must "end now."

"Israel must be a partner of these (Middle East) nations and no longer a pariah," he said.

On Bosnia, Clinton said the United States would "begin to invigorate negotiations to bring about an end to the bloodshed and aggression" in the war-torn country.

He spoke as NATO announced that it would launch air strikes against Serbian-controlled targets unless Serbian insurgent forces lift the two-year-old siege of Sarajevo by Feb. 20.

Last Tuesday, WJC leaders went to Capitol Hill and testified on the danger of global anti-Semitism.

In prepared remarks, Montreal-born WJC President Edgar Bronfman spoke of "the growth and spread of intolerance, racism and hatred of foreigners, and, as a central feature of that, the resurgence of the longest hatred of all: anti-Semitism."

In 1993, there was "no slackening of anti-Semitic pressures in certain key trouble spots," he said.

However, Bronfman also noted that "whatever the level of anti-Semitism, what Jews are experiencing is not remotely comparable to the discrimination, violence and abuse which are a daily occurrence for other minority groups throughout the world."

The hearings before the House Foreign Affairs Committee and its subcommittee on human rights were believed to be the first-ever House hearings on global anti-Semitism featuring firsthand international testimony.

Canada's Cotler joined WJC leaders from Europe, the former Soviet Union, South America and South Africa who testified about anti-Semitism in their regions.

"What we wanted to bring out was the fact that instead of just reading about manifestations of anti-Semitism," the committee "should hear from the representatives of Jewish communities," Elan Steinberg said after the hearing.

The testimony revealed that "Jews are a barometer of the democratic process in any country," he said. "Where Jews are not faring well," human rights are also not going well.

Among the incidents specifically discussed at the hearing were the rise of Russian ultranationalist Vladimir Zhirinovsky, the recent attack on Argentina's Chief Rabbi in Buenos Aires and the recent erecting of a statue in Romania to wartime dictator Ion Antonescu.

Meanwhile, Steinberg said the subcommittee chairman, Rep. Tom Lantos (D-Cal.), had pledged his support in efforts to regain Jewish properties seized by Nazi and Communist governments in Europe.

Vigils to be held across the country

The RCA's resolutions have "moral value," said Joseph, "but we need things with legal teeth." Although a number of rabbis are using prenuptial agreements, Joseph said that such a document has not been standardized. "There are nine written that I know of, and everyone is debating about this clause and that clause."

That problem is likely to be remedied, or at least ameliorated, once the RCA's Life Cycle Madrich, its rabbinic manual, is published later this year. Ottawa's Rabbi Reuven Bulka, of Machzikei Hadas Congregation, is writing the section of the text dealing with prenuptial agreements. The RCA has agreed upon a text, he told The CJN, and "hopefully it will become employed as a standard item."

Prenuptial agreements may help resolve future problems, but they are of little use to present-day agunot. Rabbinic sanctions against recalcitrant husbands have accordingly been one focus of ICAR's work. Last year the Coalition of Jewish Women for the Get sent letters to rabbis across Canada asking them to "incorporate forceful positions against any person who refuses to participate in the get process."

Congregation Beth Tikvah of Montreal, led by Rabbi Mordechai Zeitz, was the first synagogue in Canada to take such action and the only one, to Joseph's knowledge, prior to the letter being sent. The synagogue's constitution was amended so that anyone refusing to participate in a Jewish divorce could not be a member in good standing.

Machzikei Hadas followed suit with a similar amendment last year. "Symbolically, it's very important," said Rabbi Bulka. "It's a signal that we have zero tolerance for nonsense."

A seruv is issued by the Beit Din to anyone who fails to respond to three summonses to the rabbinical court. The proclamation, indicating that the person is in contempt of court, is a tool which ICAR would like to see employed more frequently.

"Most batei din won't issue a seruv," says Joseph. "Most will refrain from calling a recalcitrant husband [to the court] a third time, in order to refrain from putting his name as being in contempt of court."

"A seruv is not necessarily a very effective instrument," counters Rabbi Mordechai Ochs, chair of Toronto's Beth Din Tzedek. "If this were the answer, we would be glad to use it." Rabbi Ochs is convinced that a seruv has value only if the person in question is observant and has respect for the Beit Din process. "All it does is highlight the plight," he said, although he conceded that the latter result in itself "may be effective in some instances."

Organizers of the upcoming vigil are hoping that the plight of agunot will be brought to light so that they can find some assistance. "We are committed to making the problem of agunot a household [term]," says Etty Danzig, Toronto-based president of Na'amat Canada.

Addresses and phone numbers for agunot to write or call for help will be available at each vigil.

Canadian locations for the vigil, to be held on February 23 at 7:30 p.m. local time, are:

- Vancouver — Talmud Torah on Oak Street
- Edmonton — City Hall
- Winnipeg — Jewish Community Council, 370 Hargrave St.
- Hamilton — Jewish Community Centre
- Toronto — Jewish Community Centre, North Y branch, 4588 Bathurst St.
- Ottawa — City Hall
- Montreal — Cummings Building lobby, 5151 Cote Ste. Catherine Rd.
- Halifax — Congregation Beth Israel.

For further information about the vigils or about the coalition, contact B'nai Brith Women, Hadassah-WIZO, Emunah Women of Canada, Na'amat Canada, Status of Women Committee of Canadian Jewish Congress, Women's Canadian ORT or Women's Federation.

Financial deal sought

He said that currently, "the accounts payable are in arrears" with some suppliers waiting more than six months to be paid. He said there are no lawsuits pending and that staff are being paid "more or less on time."

The JCC is not near bankruptcy, he emphasized.

Asked about a situation where JCC cheques to some staff bounced, Perlmutter said "there was a period in the summer where for technical reasons" attributable to a change of accounts, the cheques were not covered by the bank.

Perlmutter said one of the proposals under consideration to revamp the JCC involves the JCC giving up ownership of the land at the North branch. "In most North American communities, the facilities are owned by the community or a trust," he said. "The Toronto JCC is unique in that the facilities are owned by the JCC itself. If the financing plan requires the community to become owner of the facility, we don't see any problem with that."

When asked about the allocation from the Endowment Fund, Perlmutter called it "a subvention" (a grant or subsidy) while Ghert said it was "a loan." Asked later to comment on the discrepancy, Perlmutter said no final decision on that has yet been taken.

Perlmutter said that the JCC's new operating plans should not affect the membership. Membership fees "will remain competitive" and the summer tennis program at the Northeast Valley branch will not be affected, he said.

Karen Chisvin, chair of the Bloor branch, said the downtown members remain committed to "a new arrangement" that will see the branch become independent of the JCC. Ghert said such a move is contingent on broader, Centre-wide arrangements.

Commenting on changes to the JCC that are aimed at making it operate more efficiently, Perlmutter said he expects to "consolidate jobs" among staff, adding "there is always staff turnover."

Ghert gave the current JCC leadership a vote of confidence, saying it appears to be "doing a good job." In recent months a new comptroller has taken over, as have lay leaders "who understand the situation," he said.

BBC Officials in Geneva

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish officials will be monitoring proceedings this month of the United Nations Commission on Human Rights, with special attention on Israel and international right-wing extremism. Brian Morris, national vice-president of B'nai Brith Canada and chair of BBC's institute for international affairs, and Paul Marcus, institute director, are in Geneva until Feb. 25 for the 50th session of the commission, which runs to March 5. They will also examine the work of the recently-appointed UN Commissioner on Human Rights and the Special Rapporteur on racism, racial discrimination and xenophobia. Also scheduled are meetings with officials of the International Red Cross and members of the local Jewish community.

Catholics Stage 'Fiddler'

CALGARY — Fiddler on the Roof is being staged here next month — by a Catholic high school. Over 250 students of St. Francis High School are involved in all stages of production. The school has enlisted the help of the Jewish community to ensure the production is in keeping with Jewish tradition and history. Teacher Jean MacEachern said she sees the project as a way of extending friendship between Jews and Catholics.

Local Agencies Face Cuts

VANCOUVER — The 20 Jewish agencies and programs supported by the local Combined Jewish Appeal face an eight per cent shortfall in CJA allocations. Due to a decline in CJA totals, the agencies and programs will receive 92 per cent of the "bare bones" needs, meaning the agencies will have to rely on their own fundraising and cut budgets and staff to meet budgetary needs.

Meridor to Visit

TORONTO — Member of Knesset Dan Meridor will be in Montreal, Ottawa and Toronto from March 18 to 22 as a guest of the Canadian Associates of Ben-Gurion University. Meridor, who served as Israel's justice minister from 1988 to 1992, will present his views on the Israel-PLO self-rule accord and help the Canadian Associates of BGU to establish a program of deferred giving and to provide scholarships for Ethiopian immigrant students.

'President' Arafat — For Life?

JERUSALEM — PLO officials last week finalized a "constitution" that makes Yasser Arafat president of the Palestinian government until at least 1999, in the event a peace agreement is finalized, sources said. An elected Palestinian government would later decide what form of democracy and constitution would be adopted. While still naming him president for five years after taking office, the final draft no longer allows Arafat to appoint his own vice-president. It also takes away from him the sole authority of imposing capital punishment, as was stipulated in earlier drafts.

Iraq Stockpiling Chemicals: MK

JERUSALEM — A shipment of 35 tons of ammonium perchlorate, used in the manufacture of chemical weapons, was seized last week en route to Iraq, proving the Iraqis are ignoring UN orders and continuing to arm themselves with nonconventional weapons, Labor MK Ehpraim Sneh told the Knesset. Sneh said a German vessel, the Asian Senator, was seized in Jedda, Saudi Arabia, carrying the chemicals. The boat was on its way to Beirut via the Suez Canal, where the cargo was to be unloaded and transported overland to Iraq.

Bosnian Kids Retrieve Parents

JERUSALEM — Two children rescued from Sarajevo at the beginning of Bosnia's civil war are to fly to Budapest this week to meet their parents, who have decided to live in Israel. The Jewish Agency is flying Binyamin Cilbivics, 16, and his sister Vanja, 14, to the Hungarian capital to bring their parents to the Jewish state. The parents are part of a group of 176 Jews who left the Bosnian capital in a recent convoy. About 50 Jews said they intended to live in Israel. As well, the International Christian Embassy in Jerusalem announced it is paying for buses to bring potential immigrants from Croatia to Budapest, from where they are to fly here.

Castro: Jewish Families Can Reunite

JERUSALEM — Cuban President Fidel Castro has promised to approve any request received from Israel to permit an individual Jew or Jewish family to emigrate for family reunification, Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi Yisrael Lau said last week after returning from Cuba. Rabbi Lau said Castro would not establish ties with Israel without consulting Arab states. The Chief Rabbi said Castro strongly supports the peace process. Castro gave the rabbi boxes of Cuban cigars for Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, Foreign Minister Shimon Peres, Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert, and former capital mayor Teddy Kollek, each bearing his personal calling card.

Agency Tsuris Widens

JERUSALEM — Former Jewish Agency treasurer and current Likud MK Meir Sheetrit is under police investigation for the possible illegal use of Agency credit cards. Sheetrit said he was unaware of the investigation and is innocent of wrongdoing. The report came as the Attorney General's office is preparing to issue a decision on whether to indict current Jewish Agency Chairman Simcha Dinitz for alleged misuse of his Agency credit cards for personal expenditures.

Women Face IDF Bias: MKs

JERUSALEM — Members of the Knesset status of women committee last week blasted the IDF for allegedly discriminating against women. Labor MK Dalia Itzik said it is "dubious democracy" if Chief of General Staff Lt.-Gen. Ehud Barak, who was asked to attend, was not there to hear complaints that women face an unfair deal in military service. Likud MK Limor Livnat said female MKs oppose the shortening of women's service without finding ways of maintaining a broad range of jobs for female soldiers.

Four Soldiers Buried

JERUSALEM — A tense quiet reigned in south Lebanon and along the northern border last Tuesday, as the four soldiers killed in fierce fighting in the security zone the day before were laid to rest. The funerals were attended by hundreds of people. Hezbollah claimed that only one of its men was killed and another wounded in the clash, but Israeli military sources said the attackers suffered far heavier casualties in the battle and in later shelling and air strikes.

Knesset Hosts PLO Backers

JERUSALEM — For the first time, the Knesset played host last week to Palestinians aligned with the PLO. At the invitation of Knesset member Ran Cohen of the leftist Meretz party, five Palestinians from Nablus attended a meeting with lawmakers from mostly left-wing parties. The visitors called for the release of Palestinian prisoners, whom they described as having no Israeli blood on their hands. They also called for the release of Israeli soldiers missing in action.

Dutch Mikvah Unearthed

AMSTERDAM — A mikvah, or ritual Jewish bath, dating back more than 200 years has been discovered during recent excavations in the Dutch city of Utrecht. Jews were not allowed to reside in the city until the end of the 18th century. Before then, they could trade in the markets, but had to leave before nightfall. When Jews were allowed to reside in Utrecht, synagogue services were first held in a private house. It was at the site of a one-time private home where the mikvah was discovered.

Dispute Splits French Jews

PARIS — A bitter dispute is dividing the Paris Consistoire, the body that oversees the religious needs of Paris Jewry, and if a resolution is not reached soon, a non-Jewish administrator may soon be appointed to run the organization. According to those opposing the group's president, Benny Cohen, the Consistoire has become overly committed to Orthodoxy at the expense of the needs of the community's less religious members. If the board cannot reach agreement within several weeks, the Consistoire would be run for three months by a non-Jewish administrator appointed by a Paris court.

Jews, Christians hold dialogue in Israel

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — A huge interfaith conference held here this month broke new ground by bringing many Church luminaries to Jerusalem for the first time and thereby offering de facto recognition of Israeli sovereignty over the capital city.

Top Christian leaders joined rabbis from around the world, including Canada, to address the common challenges posed by modernity in the largest interfaith conference ever held in Jerusalem.

Despite a boycott by Israel's Orthodox and ultra-Orthodox establishment, the International Jewish/Christian Conference on Modern Social and Scientific Challenges was hailed as a big success, drawing more than 500 delegates from 97 countries.

Attending from Canada were Rabbi Dow Marmur of Toronto's Holy Blossom Temple and Rabbi Howard Joseph of the Spanish and Portuguese Synagogue in Montreal.

Christian leaders from Canada in attendance included the Very Rev. Lois Wilson, former moderator of the United Church of Canada, Prof. William Dunphy, former principal of St. Michael's College and Patricia Baird, head of the Royal Commission on Reproductive Technologies.

The presence of so many Christian leaders came in the wake of the recent establishment of diplomatic ties between the Vatican and Israel and a generally warmer international attitude toward Israel as a result of the Middle East peace accords.

"There were top appointees of the Church from the Vatican and top appointees of the Protestants from Geneva," said Rabbi Joseph Ehrenkranz, administration director of the Centre for Christian-Jewish Understanding at Sacred Heart University in Fairfield, Conn.

"And they were here on an equal footing (with the Jews) at the invitation of the Jewish people," he said. "Outside of the Pope, what more (could) you want?"

The conference was sponsored by the Bamot Center for Cultural and Social Studies in cooperation with the Tantur Ecumenical Institute.

The notables included Joseph Cardinal Ratzinger, said to be the world's most powerful cardinal and the leading conservative voice in the Catholic Church, based in Rome; Cardinal Carlo Maria Martini, the archbishop of Milan, who is often named as a possible successor to Pope John Paul II and is the most prominent Church liberal; and the Archbishop of Canterbury, George Carey.

"The academic and scholarly positions being staked out (were) not spectacularly new or ground-breaking," said Rabbi Irving Greenberg, the New York-based president of CLAL, the Center for Jewish Learning and Leadership, and one of the keynote speakers.

But the "highly visible, Jewish-sponsored" interfaith dynamic of the conference in Jerusalem was "remarkable," he said. "The number of cardinals knocked my eyes out.

"And theology follows reality," he said. He pointed to "an historic transformation of the Church toward a covenantal pluralism in its attitude toward Judaism" as evidenced by Ratzinger's speech.

Cardinal Ratzinger referred to the history of the relationship between "Israel and Christendom" as one "drenched with blood and tears," one "of mistrust and hostility," but also one marked "again and again by attempts at forgiveness, understanding and mutual acceptance. After Auschwitz, the mission of reconciliation and acceptance permits no deferral," he said.

Even as a child, said the cardinal, he could never understand how Jews could be condemned by the Church for the death of Jesus.

"Jews and Christians should accept each other in profound inner reconciliation, neither in disregard of their faith nor in its denial, but out of the depth of faith itself. In their mutual reconciliation they should become a force for peace in and for the world," he said.

Prominent rabbis from abroad included Rene Samuel Sirat, former Chief Rabbi of France and current president of the Conference of European Rabbis, and South Africa's Chief Rabbi Cyril Harris.

Rabbi David Rosen, former Chief Rabbi of Ireland and current director of interfaith relations for the Anti-Defamation League in Israel, served as the conference chair.

But several European and Israeli Orthodox rabbis scheduled to attend the conference apparently succumbed to pressure from the Orthodox and ultra-Orthodox establishments not to participate.

A statement was issued in the names of Israel's Chief Rabbis, Yisrael Lau and Eliahu Bakshi-Doron, calling on local rabbis not to attend. Former Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi Shlomo Goren, originally slated to participate, withdrew and publicly criticized the conference.

These rabbis maintained the gathering was predicated on the false assumption that the two faiths share common ground. They said the meeting would confer an unacceptable legitimacy on Christianity.

Rabbi Sirat said he believed the protest may have been a result of a misunderstanding about the nature of the conference. "Perhaps (the rabbis) were afraid there would be theological arguments," he said.

Instead, Rabbi Sirat said the conference afforded a chance for "a real dialogue to find solutions to problems we all face," including AIDS, poverty, homelessness, violence and strife in the former Yugoslavia.

Also on the agenda were the ethical and moral implications of genetic engineering, medical advances in fertility and the artificial prolongation of life.

Rabbi Sirat said he hoped the next conference would include religious leaders from Islam.

Meanwhile, Jerusalem's Latin Patriarch Michel Sabbah, a Palestinian, gave a speech voicing his hopes of achieving an enduring peace between Christians, Jews and Muslims in Israel and of promoting ethical and religious values in a pluralistic society.

In fact...

All funeral homes, without exception, charge a basic service fee for facilities, equipment and staff, which includes approximately 60 employee hours for each arrangement.

Our service fee at Benjamin's is $2720, exactly $195 more than the basic fee you would have to pay for a Jewish funeral service elsewhere. Not "thousands" more, not even two hundred more, just 7 percent.

For this 7 percent difference, we offer indisputable benefits. Dignified treatment of the deceased strictly according to Halacha. Personal attention from the most experienced staff, by far. The privacy and comforts of a tasteful environment with superior facilities. The convenience of a unique shiva support. Subsidized bereavement counseling through the Benjamin Institute. And many other intangibles including a commitment to the principles of Kavod Hamet and Tzedakah.

In honouring the departed and coming to terms with a loss, this Kavod, level of service, quality of support and professional aftercare found only at Benjamin's has a value beyond measure.

By RABBI LEIGH LERNER

Shabbat Zachor reminds us to remember Amalek, the people who attacked Israel from the rear, killing children and old people first. We often judge the viciousness of an attacker by their desire to slay the defenseless, and so Amalek stands particularly condemned. Tradition tells us that the wicked Haman was their descendant.

Since Amalek went after children and elders first, it is fitting that the two holidays that follow relate to both.

Purim is such a joyous holiday, and such a young person's delight, with its booing of Haman and its carnival and costumes. Yes, adults enjoy it, too, but part of our pleasure is the great happiness that Purim brings to the children.

Purim previews Pesach, for the smaller redemption of the Jews of Shushan reminds us immediately of the great redemption of all our people from Egypt. When we think of the exodus from Egypt, we almost automatically think of Moses, who led the Israelites even at the age of 120.

Esther and Moses were both instrumental in saving our people. Esther was young. Moses was aged. Yet how often we remember the power of youth while forgetting the strength of our elders.

We must remember that people not only live longer these days, they often live long lives with full strength and presence of mind throughout their time on earth. Retirement is coming later for many, not for economic reasons, but because there is no reason to "hang up the gloves," or because individuals have already begun a new career which, in the fullness of life, they wish to pursue. Others may retire at a younger age, yet soon find themselves involved in new interests that require their energy and concentration.

Moses began a new career as a shepherd when he ran away from Egypt. (Recall that he killed a slavemaster and fled.) How long he was a shepherd, we do not know, but he was called to represent God to Pharaoh. Since Moses lived to 120, and since the Israelites wandered 40 years in the wilderness, he must have been close to 80 when he changed his career the third time. The Torah never alludes to the possibility that Moses might be superannuated — just plain too old.

As we enter this season of Purim and Pesach, let us recall not only the power of the youthful Esther, but the strength and leadership of the aged Moses. Our elder statesmen in the Jewish community have a great role to play in guiding, governing, and enlightening us.

Shabbat Zachor teaches us that Jews, both old and young, are equally valuable and worthy of protection as elements of our community. I've never heard anyone say, "I'm a retired Jew." Let all build our community together, and let us be wise enough to gather our strength from all who care to give of themselves.

Religious leaders call for Bosnia truce

ISTANBUL — Asserting that "a crime committed in the name of religion is a crime against religion," Eastern Orthodox, Roman Catholic, Muslim and Jewish religious leaders last week called for an end to "crimes against humanity [that] continue in Bosnia, in Armenia/Azerbaijan, Georgia and Tadjikistan."

"We demand an end to this brutality," the religious leaders said in a declaration adopted at the conclusion last Thursday of a three-day "Conference on Peace and Tolerance" held here.

The conference was co-sponsored by the New York-based Appeal of Conscience Foundation, led by Rabbi Arthur Schneier, and by the Ecumenical Patriarchate under Bartholomew I, spiritual leader of the world's 270 million Eastern Orthodox Christians.

"The Jewish people have a special interest in the principles enunciated in the Declaration," Rabbi Schneier said, "since they are the ones often caught in the middle when a nation or region is beset by internal religious or nationalistic upheaval."

He noted that nearly 100,000 Jews live in Central Asia, scene of several such conflicts.

The declaration, which denounced "ethnic cleansing" and rejected "the concept that it is possible to justify one's actions in any armed conflict in the name of G-d," was signed by Cardinal Roger Etchegaray, president of the Vatican's Pontifical Council on Peace and Justice; Mehmet Nuri Yilmaz, president of the Office of Religious Affairs of the Republic of Turkey; the Ecumenical Patriarch, Bartholomew I; Rabbi Schneier, and some 60 conference participants from Central Asia, the Caucasus and the Balkans; religious leaders from the United States, Russia and other lands of the former Soviet Union, Eastern Europe, United Nations officials and others.

Conference delegates also established an Appeal of Conscience Commission on Conflict Resolution, composed of representatives of all of the faiths and countries represented at the conference, to deal with ethnic conflicts.

The commission will recommend ways "to deal with the scourge of extreme nationalism and ethnic conflict," according to the declaration.

The statement, known as the Bosphorus Declaration, cited the Berne Declaration of Nov. 26, 1992, at which the heads of the Catholic, Muslim and Serbian Orthodox religious communities of Croatia, Bosnia and Yugoslavia joined in demanding an end to religious, national and ethnic conflict in their country.

According to the Bosphorous Declaration, "we have seen many crimes committed in the name of religion and we wish to speak out vigorously against them. The crimes against humanity continue in Bosnia, in Armenia/Azerbaijan, Georgia and Tadjikistan. The cruelties have continued unchecked and we demand an end to this brutality."

Participants also issued the following declarations:

- on religious communities: "We cannot emphasize enough that spiritual nourishment is a paramount requirement. Religious communities must be supported. We also recognize that all the countries suffering from conflict have had a long, dark period of communism, where there was little or no spiritual education."
- on refugees: "We call upon all religious faiths to speak out clearly and consistently against . . .the forced migration of refugees. We condemn those who uproot families from their homes, tear children from their parents, divide husband and wife in the name of false nationalisms. We expect all religious leaders to stand fast in the protection of those threatened by involuntary migration, whatever their religious beliefs or ethnic backgrounds."
- on war criminals: "We have deliberated carefully and are in agreement that the wanton killing must stop; that those who continue to perpetrate such heinous acts are criminals and that, although we have no weapons of war and no armies for combat, we have a greater strength — the strength of spiritual might.

"We totally condemn those who commit the brutalities, the killings, the rapes, mutilations, forcible displacement, and inhuman beatings."

Investment and ideology make a bad mix in Israel

By MIKE FLORENCE

Just over a year ago, a communications guru named John Parikhal predicted a trend toward extremes in North American society. Certainly, in Parikhal's own field, the popularity of radio and television personalities such as Rush Limbaugh with his simplistic, dogmatic conservatism and Howard Stern, with his shock-talk tactics, has proven the prediction to be remarkably accurate.

Unfortunately, this flirtation with extremism has afflicted the Jewish community as well. The Feb. 3 issue of The Canadian Jewish News reported that Israel Bond campaigns in some U.S. congregations had suffered financially because congregants were upset about the Israeli government's peace policies. North Hollywood, California Rabbi Marvin Sugarman claimed to have been labelled a traitor by some members of his shul for attempting to sell Israel Bonds. Increasingly, some advocates for Jewish residents of Judea and Samaria are urging boycotts of organizations such as State of Israel Bonds and UJA, because they have not sufficiently supported the citizens of Judea and Samaria. The boycott cries are issued even though the organizations under attack are apolitical and have not embraced any other ideological leanings either.

If this is not alarmingly narrow thinking, it's difficult to understand what is. How else can we explain the blindness of boycott leaders to the burgeoning needs of Jews around the world and the crippling cost of immigrant absorption in Israel, which are financially funded by UJA donations and Israel Bond investments? Only those with tunnel vision could demand that mainstream organizations adopt the ideological positions espoused by the boycott barons.

This is not a political commentary on the value of Judea and Samaria or its citizens. This is neither a right-wing nor a left-wing opinion piece. This is merely an appeal for a return to the fairness, moderation and compassion which have made Jewish communities models for the rest of the world.

Asking investors, for ideological reasons, to boycott Bonds is neither fair, compassionate, nor, for that matter, even Jewish. We have never punished the people of Israel for the perceived failings of its government. As Jews, we have always supported each other regardless of ideology.

In the 40-year-plus history of Israel Bonds in Canada, there has been a succession of Israeli prime ministers from different parties, with different politics. Never before has the investment value of Bonds been brushed aside because of disagreements with the political or diplomatic course Israel took. If Bonds investment had been tied to ideology, Israel would be a much weaker country today. Canadians purchased over $100 million in Bonds last year because they are beneficial to individual investors and all of Israel. When it comes to the welfare of the Jewish people, investment and ideology don't mix. Linking Jewish needs to ideological correctness is a dangerous venture.

Buying Bonds does not prevent an investor from also supporting his or her preferred social, political or cultural causes. The State of Israel Bonds organization does not try to stop investors from financially assisting any other enterprise. Why do the boycott captains seek to restrict the right of their supporters to buy Bonds? Must all Jewish organizations be a perfect ideological match to merit our support? Of course not. If that were the case, world Jewry would be in a sorry state.

Boycott advocates are travelling along an insular, parochial path — one that will enlarge already existing rifts among Jews, one that will damage bridges connecting Diaspora Jewry with Israel. The financial benefits of buying Bonds have been well documented by objective analysts. The ability of Bonds to link Jews around the world has been recognized by, among others, the Prime Minister of Israel, Yitzhak Rabin, who has repeatedly pronounced his opposition to anything or anyone threatening to sever those ties. With reckless rhetoric and one-dimensional advocacy, those who support boycotts can only contribute to the alienation of Jews from Israel and each other.

Let us hope that sanity will prevail and that we will be able to accept our differences without hurting each other.

By CYNTHIA MANN

The time is ripe to reassess the old, stereotyical formulas that have characterized the relationship between Israel and the Diaspora, asserts the new head of the world Jewry division of Israel's Foreign Ministry.

Haim Divon, who was Israel's ambassador to Ethiopia from 1991 to 1993, was tapped last September to take the Foreign Ministry job. He replaced Yehudi Kinar, who is now serving as the consul general in San Francisco.

Divon, who has served in diplomatic posts in Sri Lanka, India and Canada, said the division has been restructured and charged with a more "tightly defined agenda."

And that, he said, signals that the matter of world Jewry will be taken more seriously by the Foreign Ministry.

He spoke of a "new chapter" in the division and of the "fresh outlook" of Foreign Minister Shimon Peres, Deputy Minister Yossi Beilin and Director General Uri Savir.

"Each of them realizes it's high time to give proper attention to the Diaspora," he said.

Divon, who reports directly to Savir, said he has had "more meetings in the last four months" on the Diaspora with Savir, Peres and Beilin "than there were (in the ministry) in the last four years."

Divon's mandate is broader than that of his predecessor and its profile has been raised, said Malcolm Hoenlein, executive vice chairman of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations.

The peace process has begun to free Israelis to stop a nearly exclusive focus on security issues and start a little "soul-searching," said Divon.

That soul-searching includes a serious re-examination of the relationship to Diaspora Jewry, which is changing and grappling with new and serious issues of its own, he said.

"In Israel, the whole concept of Diaspora Jewry is a very distorted one," Divon remarked. In the 1950s, the Diaspora meant "food parcels," and then later it meant "dedicating forests or buildings," and "a memorial plaque."

Even to professionals in the field, the role of Diaspora Jews was reduced to "a political lobby or a schnorrer," he said.

"It's not our fault," he added. "No one taught us. Jewish history lessons ended after the Second World War."

At the same time, for many Diaspora Jews who never visit, Israel is reduced to "what they see on television about the intifada," Divon said, referring to the Palestinian uprising.

And those who do come under the auspices of a typical United Jewish Appeal mission get exposed to what Divon called an "over-saccharined package" of a mythical country.

"It's artificial," he said. "Then they go back and dream about making aliyah, and when they come, they get disappointed. They go to City Hall and get the shock of their lives" over the bureaucracy and hardships of daily life in Israel.

"They need to get a more balanced picture," said Divon. The biggest achievement of Israelis is their ability to maintain "their sanity and their democratic system" in the face of enormous pressures, including military service and a high cost of living.

On both ends, Divon stressed, "there must be much more sincere dialogue, not just an effort at the top to solve world Jewish affairs."

The Foreign Ministry's newly intensified interest was reflected in the recent establishment by Peres of a committee slated to look at relations with the Diaspora, to be chaired by Uri Gordon, head of the immigration and absorption department of the Jewish Agency.

But several sources say the effort ran aground when other Jewish Agency leaders protested that the ministry was stepping on their turf.

The sources say those at the agency were hypersensitive after Beilin attacked it as anachronistic.

Divon, the diplomat, said he worked with the agency on the rescue of Ethiopian Jews, "and they did a tremendous job."

"But we feel we have our (diplomatic) missions and they give us an opportunity to reach out to Jewish communities in an unprecedented manner. We're not trying to replace any establishment, but we think we can add" to others, he said.

An ambassador or a consul general is the highest Israeli representative in a country, said Divon, "a symbol that can be used to stimulate new thinking."

Divon envisions these representatives getting involved in the discussions now absorbing Jewish communities on Jewish identity and continuity, on intermarriage and on assimilation.

"If we are a Jewish state, then these are also problems of Israel, and we have to be concerned," he said.

He would also like to see Israeli mission heads involved in the discussion of UJA allocation of funds.

"(We hear) it is more and more difficult to support Jewish education, and we feel that when Israel is suddenly stronger it's more important to share these funds with local needs," said Divon.

The ministry wants to change the formula, he said, "so Israel is not just on the receiving end' but looks at "what Israel can contribute."

For now, one of Divon's main tasks is to monitor Diaspora reaction to the peace process and to try to keep Jews abroad informed about what is going on.

He said he and his bosses do not expect uniformity on the issue, but do expect support in the final crunch.

"We don't want robots, we want debate," he said. "That reflects a degree of involvement."

In the meantime, he wants the Jewish world to put the Israel-Palestine Liberation Organization agreement in context and recognize that for Israel far broader changes have already occurred.

He cited Israel's improved international posture as well as new economic deals that are the direct fruit of the changing diplomatic climate.

"Don't just judge what's happening (around) the current stumbling block" he said. "If the agreement falls apart, it won't (take away) the (other) achievements."

In any case, "to stand with a stopwatch is ridiculous. We need a year" to gauge the impact of the current flurry of events, he said.

Schindler's List: most poignant film about Holocaust

By ARNOLD AGES

After the accolades comes the criticism. Frank Rich of the New York Times thinks that Schindler's List obscures the identity of the Holocaust victims because, aside from Ben Kingsley's character, there is a pall of anonymity which falls over the film's depiction of those Schindler saved.

Other critics complain about the Israeli accented English that is supposed to pass for Polish-Jewish accented Yiddish and still others have objected to the pronunciation of the Hebrew used in several prayer sequences — and the anomaly of a Jewish couple speculating in modern Hebrew as to whether they should hide under a bed as the SS approaches.

These are picayune remarks which validate the dictum Susan Sontag once offered about criticism: "It is the compliment which mediocrity pays to genius." Yes, Steven Spielberg's film is a multi-dimensional work of genius in terms of conception, psychology and execution. The New Yorker's film critic put it best when he said in a recent column that the special merit of this film lies in the fact that Spielberg has brilliantly explored one of the Holocaust's greatest ironies.

And what is that irony? Many of Schindler's Jews have pointed to it when they express astonishment and puzzlement at why Schindler did what he did. Spielberg takes this question and runs with it throughout the film by showing that it is more difficult to explain the good exemplified in the life of Oskar Schindler than it is to explain the evil incarnated in people like Amon Goth, the brutal SS commandant at the Plaschow labor camp.

Arnold Ages

Until something else comes along to displace it, Spielberg's movie will remain the most poignant and eloquent elegy extant in film about the agony of European Jewry. It achieves this because of the director's artistic skill in drawing his audience gradually into the vortex of Jewish suffering, moving from near normalcy to the despairing and melancholic agony of the final moments — all seen from the perspective of that little island of survivors who, under Schindler's protection, lived in the hurricane's eye.

If Spielberg's film is the most powerful commentary on the Holocaust in its genre, it should be noted that there are other genres, especially in the medium of print, where the suffering of European Jews is reflected through other powerful artistic prisms. In this context, the Yiddish poetry of Jacob Glatstein is, to my mind, the literary equivalent of Spielberg's artistry. Glatstein's Holocaust poems reach depths of feeling that mere prose could never approach.

Glatstein was born in 1896 in Lublin and emigrated to the United States in 1914. He was part of the "introspectivist" school of Yiddish poetry. Emanuel Goldsmith of Queen's College in New York City, says that Glatstein "was one of the truly outstanding poets of Judaism in the twentieth century," and that his poems "plumbed the Jewish psyche and contributed to the most significant achievement of Yiddish and Hebrew letters in our time."

It is Glatstein's Yiddish poems of the Holocaust which, unique among all literary renderings of the event, in a highly original way use the source streams of Jewish learning — Bible, Talmud, Midrash, liturgy — to create a modern lamentation on Jewish fate. There is no treacly sentimentalism in his verse. As Goldsmith notes in a new English translation of Glatstein's poems presented by Barnett Zumoff (Ktav), the Lublin-born seer appealed to the readers' high moral and spiritual order and blended familial grief with collective consciousness.

Of all the poems which Glatstein penned, one, in my opinion, stands out for its virtually perfect fusing of all the elements described above. It is called Nisht Di Metim Loyben Gott — The Dead Don't Praise God. In this poem with its echoes of the Psalms and Hallel, Glatstein memorializes the martyred millions through the fate of his own destroyed community in Lublin.

The poet begins by saying of the great Torah centre that was Lublin: "We accepted the Torah on Sinai,/ And in Lublin, we gave it back./ The dead don't praise God —/ The Torah was given for life./ And just as we all stood together/ At the giving of the Torah,/ So indeed did we all die in Lublin."

Glatstein then addresses the tragedy of Jewish suffering by placing it in the context of Jewish history as experienced by a curly-headed child, starting from the epoch-making Sinai experience and tracing the sweet grandeur of Jewish holidays such as Shavuot. But, as the poet intones: "And when we were destroyed / You were extinguished with us."

There is a list in Glatstein's poem which resonates like the list that Schindler kept. The difference is that Glatstein's list deals not with survivors but with martyrs. After describing the death of all the Jews in Lublin, he writes: "Dear souls flew in from everywhere:/ Those that had lived a long life, those that had died young/ Those that were tortured and tested in the fires,/ Those not-yet-born;/ And all the Jews that had died, starting with Father Abraham."

The image of dead souls flying in to comfort the dying Jews of Lublin grows longer in Glatstein's dirge: the matriarchs are there, and Miriam, and Deborah the prophetess, and Moses and Aaron, and King David, Maimonides, the Vilna Gaon, the Maharal of Prague. The poet sums up: "And together with each holy soul/ That died in pain/ There died hundreds of souls/ Of dear dead Jews."

Two lists — one of the living, one of the dead but both powerful reconstructions of the Holocaust experience.

Recently, all eyes were on Farrakhan — the leader of the Nation of Islam — when he called a rare news conference to comment on an anti-Semitic, anti-white, anti-Catholic and homophobic speech delivered by one of his aides, Khalid Abdul Muhammad, at Kean College in Union, New Jersey. In the course of his diatribe, Muhammad had lashed out at Jews, describing them as "blood suckers of the black nation" who "crucified Jesus in a kangaroo court," who were disproportionately involved in the antebellum slave trade, and who currently control the financial affairs of the United States.

Outright, unabashed racism of the kind espoused by Muhammad, regrettably, is not a novel phenomenon in the upper echelons of the Nation of Islam. A decade ago, Farrakhan had the audacity to call Judaism a "gutter religion," a description worthy of the neo-Nazi fringe.

After Muhammad's implicit declaration of war against the Jewish community, prominent black American leaders, ranging from the Rev. Jesse Jackson to Benjamin Chavis Jr. (of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People), denounced Muhammed and urged Farrakhan to distance himself from his assistant's uncivilized and ahistorical remarks. Farrakhan was thus under immense pressure to respond, and hopefully, to clear the air.

But instead of dissociating himself from his wayward aide, Farrakhan temporized. He demoted Muhammad, yet upheld his divisive beliefs. As he put it: "I found the speech... vile in manner, repugnant, malacious, mean-spirited and spoken in mockery of individuals and people, which is against the spirit of Islam. While I stand by the truths (our italics) that he spoke, I must condemn in the strongest terms the manner in which those truths were represented."

Clearly, Farrakhan's rebuke is less than acceptable, either to self-respecting blacks or Jews. By regurgitating Muhammad's self-destructive lies and calumnies, Farrakhan has effectively aligned himself with the dark forces of racism, with the retrogressive elements who would, if they could, disenfranchise blacks, Jews and other minorities.

The Nation of Islam promotes black pride and black entrepreneurship, goals all blacks should support in their quest for true equality in a society that has repeatedly shunned, humiliated and wronged them. But the road to egalitarianism does not, and cannot, pass through a morass of inflammatory untruths. It is still not too late for Farrakhan and his movement to turn back, make amends and ally themselves with those whose common and unrelenting enemy is racism.

Wake-up call

Since January 1992 when Algerian President Chadli Benjedid cancelled national elections in his country — in order to halt the prospective victory of the Islamic Salvation Front — the North African country has been rocked by intracommunity violence so great that it threatens the stability of Algeria and the Arab world in general.

The New York Times (Jan. 24) reports that thousands of foreign workers and diplomats have fled Algeria in recent months; embassies have been turned into armed compounds and flak jackets have become de rigueur for American personnel in Algiers, the nation's capital.

Since the aborted elections of 1992, Islamic militants representing a broad spectrum of fundamentalist beliefs have initiated armed insurrection and in the ensuing confrontations more than 2,000 people have been slain. Leading Algerian intellectuals who have opposed Islamic fundamentalism have also become targets of the militants' wrath.

The outcome of the Algerian struggle is being closely watched by Arab and western governments, and by Israel. The creation of an Islamic state in Algeria could precipitate a stampede of half a million immigrants into France. An Islamic fundamentalist state in Algeria aligned with radical regimes in Iran and Sudan would provide a powerful impetus for fundamentalist cadres in Egypt as well as other Arab countries. The spectre of such regimes on Israel's borders is not calculated to inspire confidence in the future of the region.

In this context the exertions of Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and Foreign Minister Shimon Peres to reach an honorable accommodation with the PLO appear both desirable and urgent. Israel has already learned, from its experience with Hamas, Gaza's version of fundamentalist Islam, the dangers which religious extremism can pose for a government dedicated to reaching a peaceful solution of a protracted conflict.

Algeria is the wake-up call for Israel and the Arab nations to cooperate ever more strongly in the battle for sanity and stability.

LAPID FAMILY VIGIL

Miriam Lapid, whose husband and son were killed by terrorists a month ago, arrived in Jerusalem after a four day march from Kiryat Arba with her 13 children to begin a vigil outside the Prime Minister's home to protest the government's policy on security and territorial withdrawal. Here, visitors to the Lapid tent outside the Prime Minister's home listen to a shiur (religious discourse) being given by Rabbanit Lior of Emunah College. [Isranet photo]

Letters to the Editor

Letters are welcome if they are brief, in English or French, typewritten with lines double spaced, and of interest to our reading public. Readers are cautioned not to make sweeping claims against persons or institutions which they cannot verify, as libel laws are very stringent. BEIT RAYIM POSITION

It was with great disappointment that I read the recent article by Ron Csillag on Beit Rayim Synagogue. I would have expected a reputable newspaper such as the Canadian Jewish News to ensure that their reporters research articles carefully to prevent erroneous and harmful misinformation from being published.

The article (Beit Rayim Marks First Year, Jan. 13) implied that Beit Rayim Synagogue is simply a remake of Shaareh Haim Syangogue. This is not true. Beit Rayim is a new synagogue, with the new ideas, a new board of directors, and new members. We are in no way associated with Shaareh Haim.

The article proceeded to state that the purchase of the building site at 9711 Bayview Ave. "left a bitter taste" with the members of Beit Rayim and that "USDS was viewed by many as having waited for the shul to go broke." Let it be clear that this is not the feeling of the membership nor the board of directors of Beit Rayim. We have an excellent working relationship with USDS, and hope to continue working together to strengthen the conservative Jewish community in York Region.

Another error relates to our association with Beth Sholom synagogue. While we may decide to loosen this association in the future, we have no plans to do so at this time.

Loren D. Grossman, MD,
Beit Rayim Synagogue

Ron Csillag replies:

The former Shaareh Haim Congregation was mentioned in the article on Beit Rayim's first anniversary in order to put the story into context and to explain the circumstances which gave rise to the founding of a new congregation in the North Bayview area. Many Beit Rayim congregants were members of Shaare Haim and the congregation is located in the building which originally belonged to Shaarei Haim.

WHO NEEDS AID MOST?

You report that Israel's Deputy Foreign Minister, Yossi Beilin, at a meeting of Zionist women in Tel Aviv, provoked a firestorm of protest when he announced that Israel has a strong economy and does not need Diaspora charity (CJN, Jan. 27). Leaving aside the reaction of the delegates in attendance, the various fundraising organizations around the world and their leadership must have been positively apoplectic on hearing such a statement from a high ranking Israeli government official.

Mr. Beilin's remarks must be read in conjunction with two other articles in the same edition of The Canadian Jewish News. One talked about 13 per cent of Toronto Jewish children under the age of fourteen living in poverty and the other indicated that United Way funding for Jewish groups would not be increased and in some cases would be reduced. I do not for one moment suggest that Diaspora's support politically, morally and emotionally for Israel should in any way be diminished, but if there is a scintilla of truth that Jewish charitable funds are more desperately needed in Canada then surely that is something that ought to be investigated and the true facts ascertained.

I would suggest it would not be too difficult for some dialogue to be established and a proper analysis made of the specific needs of Israeli charities compared with the requirements of the Jewish community right here in Canada.

There can be no argument that those of us who have a lifetime commitment to Israel and Jewish causes are entitled to full disclosure of financial statments so that we can make an informed decision as to where the truth lies.

QUESTIONS FOR ASSOCIATED

Re: Funding problems slow new Associated campus, (Page 2, The CJN, Jan. 27.)

As working parents whose three children attend Associated and who are committed to day school education, this article raised several issues and questions about the decisions made by Associated's Board of Directors in recent years.

First, is the new Thornhill campus, with its 100,000 square feet of space, really necessary? While everyone agrees that an Associated presence in Thornhill is necessary, how can the Board justify a building of that size when the new campus is flanked by two other day schools — Netivot Hatorah and Leo Baeck? Just how many day schools can possibly thrive and be filled to capacity within a three-block radius?

Second, why should parents whose children are attending another Associated campus have to bear any of the burden of a new building from which their children will receive no benefit?

Third, why is a 100,000-square-foot building projected to cost $10 million when residential building costs, (which are much higher than commercial building costs) in Metro are currently averaging about $65 per square foot?

Fourth, if we all believe that Jewish education is the key to Jewish continuity, then perhaps the money that is to be squeezed out of an already squeezed-to-the-limit community would be much better spent in (a) keeping tuition costs down to make the school more accessible to a greater number of children and (b) paying for the court challenges that are necessary in our fight for provincial funding.

Fifth, where are we supposed to find the extra $10,000 per family over the next five years, to pay for all of this needless extravagance? The Board membership is clearly out of touch with the economic realities of most of the families whose children currently attend Associated. The majority of us have to have both spouses working just to keep our children in the system.

Finally, if the Board were to direct as much of their energies towards he quality of education in the school as they do in dreaming up grandiose projects, Jewish continuity in Toronto would be much better served.

Ida Nudel in Israel — a muted voice

By RABBI W. GUNTHER PLAUT

Who will ever forget the days when the rescue of Soviet Jewry was uppermost in our minds?

Who amongst us who was in Ottawa for the famous "March of the Ten Thousand," will ever forget how we walked down the streets of the capital and sang "One, two, three, four — open up the iron door! Five, six, seven, eight — open up the iron gate!"

The names of the prisoners of Zion are still clearly remembered by many of us: Vladimir Slepak, Natan Scharansky, Alexander Lerner, and "the mother of the prisoners," Ida Nudel.

In 1971, when Nudel was in her late thirties, she had first applied for her permit. Eleven years later she had become famous as the guardian angel of the prisoners of conscience, and aside from Scharansky, no one else caught the imagination of the world as she did. Her cause was championed by stars like Jane Fonda and Liv Ullman (who played her part in a movie about her life). Her case was debated in the United States Congress in 1982, and when at last she was released, Armand Hammer, who had been active in the negotiations for her freedom, flew her out of Moscow in his private plane.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut

"When a Jewish activist was arrested, Ida adopted him, working alone from her Moscow apartment, she penetrated the gulag's isolation by sending "her" prisoners packages of food, vitamins, and books, telegrams on their birthdays and even 3-D postcards of half naked women for use as prison barter. Once, when an invalid prisoner needed medical attention, Ida walked into the offices of the gulag's chief doctor and handed him a formal complaint. She managed to get the home number of a high-ranking party official and had long phone conversations with him about the prisoners. Through sheer audacity and persistence she got prisoners out of punishment cells and into hospitals. Until finally, in 1978, she became a prisoner herself, exiled to Siberia where it was so cold in winter 'you could not breathe outside, and rats and drunken rapists roamed inside the barracks.' "

The article about her appeared in the Dec. 30, 1993 edition of The Jerusalem Post and was written by Yossi Klein Halevi. Its objective is not so much to tell the story of Nudel as she once was, but as she is now. Upon arriving in Israel, most of the leading refuseniks have made an adjustment to the new environment, and one of them, Scharansky, has remained in the headlines. But Ida is what she was: an outsider and a perpetual dissident. According to Halevi, she has not learned Hebrew, and most of the projects for which she works deal with Russian immigrants. She never married and lives in a village near Tel Aviv.

What determined her path? Nudel arrived in Israel in 1987 and at the time was feted as a national heroine. But she had trouble dealing with the adulation which followed her and told her sister: "I survived hatred, but too much love can also destroy."

So she retreated into isolation and wrote her autobiography, A Hand in the Darkness, which is recognized as one of the best that has come out of the refusenik experience.

She manages to do in Israel what she had done in Russia: rub the authorities the wrong way, and function as a type of public conscience. Her latest plan is to organize thousands of Russian immigrants into a self-help network. She wants them to create their own institutions, like medical centres and schools.

She believes that the Israelis really did not want the Russian Jews to come, certainly not in as many numbers as did arrive. She comments:

"Israelis don't want us? Fine, we will start our own schools, teaching in Hebrew and also in Russian, which is a beautiful language we should not forget . . . We have to develop ways of surviving until society becomes more open. It is a short-term strategy; no immigrant wants to stay isolated from Israeli society. We will help to open the economy by creating competition. America was built by immigrants creating self-sustaining institutions."

How does she see herself?

"Every person is born with a destiny. Mine is to help my people, to be in some way an essence of national self-preservation. Maybe it is a blessing, maybe a curse, I don't know."

Halevi concludes his article as follows:

"Ida still wants to save Jews. But she knows few are listening to her, and she cannot speak to Israel in its own language. Nor is the enemy so clearly defined anymore, the targets keep shifting, from greedy politicians and small-minded bureaucrats, to left-wing intellectuals with an undeveloped sense of national self-preservation."

People no longer pay much attention to Nudel. For them, if they listen at all, she is "far out." But every society is enriched by people who have ideas that go against the mainstream, who serve as correctives and as a kind of continuing prod to the national conscience. In her way, Nudel is still doing it.

Achievements and limitations of Vatican accord

By RABBI DOW MARMUR

Whether favorable or not, Jewish reactions to the agreement between Israel and the Vatican have often confused three separate issues. As a result, people have found it difficult to recognize the true achievements of the accord, and its serious limitations.

First and foremost, this is an agreement between two sovereign states that have decided to establish diplomatic relations. Such decisions are invariably made out of self-interest. Thus the reference in the text to 'the right of the Catholic Church to property" is a way of safeguarding the church's substantial holdings in Israel. These might have been in legal jeopardy without diplomatic ties.

Similarly, the reference to "favoring Christian pilgrimages to the Holy Land" is very much in the interest of Israel's tourist industry. The proposed official visit to Israel by the Pope will no doubt, greatly promote Catholic tourism.

The second level of discourse is between the Catholic Church — as distinct from the Vatican state — and a host of Jewish institutions in the Diaspora. Thus it is not a coincidence that Gerhard Riegner of the World Jewish Congress and Rabbi David Rosen, representing the Anti-Defamation League, figured prominently in the signing ceremonies.

The statement in the document that "the Holy See reiterates its condemnation of hatred, persecution and all other manifestations of anti-Semitism against the Jewish people and individual Jews anywhere, at any time and by any one" is no doubt the result of their involvement.

Jewish organizations combating anti-Semitism have often had reason to point to its Christian antecedents and its prevalence in some church circles to this very day. The above clause is no doubt an attempt at a clear response to Jewish concerns.

But the third level of interaction, between Judaism and the Roman Catholic religion, is hardly mentioned. The secular nature of the document is stressed by the expressed intent to promote "cultural exchanges between Catholic institutions worldwide and educational, cultural and research institutions in Israel." There is no reference to religion anywhere in the document.

Jewish thinkers have been conspicuously absent in the encounters that have led to the agreement. The audience that the Pope granted to the Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi of Israel looked more ceremonial than substantive. And even if the two discussed serious matters, very much more is needed than one meeting.

Now is the time to embark on this aspect of the relationship and to set the real agenda for Catholic-Jewish relations. The existing accord has created the necessary climate, but no more than that.

Exponents of Roman Catholicism will have a much harder task than Jewish teachers here, for Judaism claims only to be the best religion for Jews. It has always been remarkably tolerant towards the religious practices of non-Jews. Christianity, on the other hand, tends to make universal claims which threaten the integrity of Judaism.

Therefore, the Catholic partners in the dialogue will have to take a hard and painful look at many of their theological assumptions, and be prepared to embark on a necessary process of revision and reinterpretation of their teachings.

They will have to ask themselves, for example, if anti-Judaism is endemic to Christian theology or only the result of bad readings of the Christian Bible; if it is possible for Christians to engage in a symmetrical dialogue with believing Jews as long as Christianity sees itself as having superseded Judaism; and if Christianity can tolerate a vibrant Judaism on its own ancestral soil in a sovereign Jewish state. The fact that Jerusalem is not even mentioned in the document is ominous.

These questions must be asked, not in order to encourage confrontation, but to point to the nature of the encounter and to stress the need for its theological — not political or institutional — nature.

Many theological discussions are, of course, taking place now, but usually only in small groups and among religious liberals. Those who engage in them are often far removed from the centres of power and, therefore, as yet rarely heeded.

Have a PSA! Have a mammogram!

By ERICA MEYER RAUZIN

I am tempted to do a column that simply repeats, for the entire 700-word length I'm allotted, these messages:

Have a PSA. Have a mammogram.
Have a PSA. Have a mammogram.
Have a PSA. Have a mammogram.
Have a PSA. Have a mammogram.
Have a PSA. Have a mammogram.
Have a PSA. Have a mammogram.

But I think you get the idea without making it look like I've been kept after class in Cancer School and instructed to write the teacher's admonition on the board 100 times.

The PSA is the blood test that measures the presence of prostate cancer antigen in a man's body. Combined with a physical exam, it is the surest way to know if a man has prostate cancer. My father had it three years ago, and has written a book about it which will be published next year by the University of Chicago (tentatively titled The Truth About Prostate Cancer, Or As Close As You're Liable to Get).

So far, the main result of his cancer is the book contract, but he has follow-up exams frequently. We sweat out his exams, and feel blessed each time they come out clear. The last one didn't look great, so he may face future surgery, but at least we know what is going on.

Erica Meyer Rauzin

The mammogram is the X-ray that can detect the presence of breast cancer. I have one every year. My mother had her annual mammogram on Jan. 10. On Jan. 14, she had a lumpectomy to remove a cancerous lump the size of a pea. The surgeon also removed the lymph nodes under her arm. The lab test on the lymph nodes came back clear of any spread of cancer. It was a miserable week and she still feels like she got hit by a truck, but she is now cancer free. She starts preventative radiation treatments next week.

Her doctor praised her for having an annual mammogram. "If you had waited another year before having that mammogram," he said, "you would have had what we in the trade call tzuris." Lots of tzuris.

Usually my column focuses on the lighter side of everyday Jewish life. But having a column means having a forum, and I'd be irresponsible not to pass along what I have learned from my parents:

Have a PSA. Have a mammogram.
Have a PSA. Have a mammogram.
Have a PSA. Have a mammogram.
Have a PSA. Have a mammogram.
Have a PSA. Have a mammogram.
Have a PSA. Have a mammogram.

I have also edited two cancer books, my father's and Sarah Winograd's Get Help, Get Positive, Get Well: An Aggressive Approach to Cancer Therapy, the helpful, meaningful story of her fight against cancer, including the role her strong Orthodox faith played in her recovery. I learned a few things from these books that I pass along — strictly as personal observations — in case they are worthwhile for you:

The first is, have the tests. Don't let this powerful enemy sneak up on you. Early detection is your best shot at a cure.

The second is, if you get cancer, manage your own case. Learn all you can. Don't let anyone awe you or order you into doing anything you don't understand and agree with. You may be under some pressure, but take a deep breath and make an informed decision.

The third is, don't borrow trouble. The cancer you have is bad enough. Cope with it. Fight back against it. Don't waste your spiritual energy worrying about what it may or may not become, what treatments you may or may not need to have, or how long you may or may not live. Just live.

And the fourth is, fight back. Stomp that sucker flat. Do everything you can to overcome it. Take the medical treatments; clean up your diet and health; find opportunities to laugh and to bolster your mental attitude; and pray, pray hard. Use every weapon in your arsenal.

The first weapon is knowledge. And so, my extended family of readers, I beg you once again,

Have a PSA. Have a mammogram.
Have a PSA. Have a mammogram.
Have a PSA. Have a mammogram.
Have a PSA. Have a mammogram.
Have a PSA. Have a mammogram.
Have a PSA. Have a mammogram.
Please.

Russian restaurants sign of times

Sheldon Kirshner visits two Jewish restaurants in Moscow.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

In Russia, where organized Jewish life was suppressed for decades, the appearance of a Jewish restaurant is not a commonplace event. It is a sign of the times, a harbinger of normalcy.

Two such restaurants are the Gamburger — the first certifiably kosher eatery in Russia — and the U Yuzefa (Joseph's Place), the first Jewish-style restaurant in this sprawling city of nine million.

Now under the supervision of Rabbi Berel Lazar, the Lubavitch representative in Moscow, the Gamburger was a non-kosher cafe when it originally opened in 1987. But in June 1993, at the behest of Rabbi Lazar, the Gamburger went kosher.

One of the proprietors, Oleg Bukharov, a Jew from Odessa, had been looking for a way to drum up business. So when Rabbi Lazar came along with his suggestion, Bukharov and his two partners were only too glad to convert the Gamburger into a restaurant where observant Jews could enjoy fast food.

The transformation of the Gamburger was set into motion after word reached Rabbi Lazar that you could buy a falafel sandwich — a Middle East dish most Moscovites will never encounter in their lives — there.

Rabbi Lazar and Bukharov discussed the details, and before long they worked out a plan which led to the Gamburger's metamorphosis.

The Gamburger — a plain establishment which has a maximum capacity of roughly 130 — is a dairy restaurant with a limited menu of soy-based vegeburgers, falafel sandwiches, fishburgers, salads, pies and soft drinks.

Most ingredients are imported from Israel, while some are bought in Russia, according to one of the owners, Sutarmin Sergei Alexandrovich, a non-Jew.

The Gamburger's mainstay, the vegeburger, is wrapped in a soft bun, accompanied by tomatoes and a pickle, and served on a white plastic plate. The accompanying side dish consists of thinly-sliced tomatoes, diced cucumbers, a layer of lettuce and slices of a hardboiled egg.

Last October, a vegeburger cost 2428 roubles, or about $2 (US), a hefty price for the majority of Russian citizens. Given Russia's hyperinflation, the vegeburger is doubtless far more expensive, rouble-wise, today.

By contrast, the falafel was 1800 roubles; the salad 743 roubles; and the drink (coke with a bitter taste) 250 roubles.

Despite this, the Gamburger is turning a nice profit, Alexandrovich said in an interview. On average, 700 to 1,100 customers come in each day. Ironically, most are not even Jewish, since the Gamburger is located on Krasnoprudnaya Street, several blocks from three of Moscow's busiest train stations.

The success of the Gamburger has encouraged Bukharov to aim even higher. Later this winter, he plans to open a formal sit-down kosher restaurant in the vicinity.

When Usef Perezovsky, 47, came up with the idea of U Yuzefa seven years ago, he ran into immediate problems.

Municipal authorities, firmly in thrall to communist preconceptions, refused to grant him a licence. Perezovsky — a former lawyer and theatre producer — protested, arguing that his was not the only ethnic restaurant in Moscow.

"I mentioned the Armenian and Georgian restaurants I was familiar with, but they claimed my restaurant would become a centre of Zionism. The KGB was really keeping a tight rein on Jewish activities."

It seemed as if the U Yuzefa had been nipped in the bud.

But Perezovsky, a lively man with a salacious sense of humor, is not easily cowed by adversity. He approached Yuri Lozhkov, then manager of a Moscow co-operative and now mayor of Moscow.

Thanks to his influence, the bureaucratic obstacles were cleared away.

But Perezovsky also credits the then American president, Ronald Reagan, for making it possible for U Yuzefa to open.

Reagan was scheduled to visit Moscow in 1988 for a superpower summit with Mikhail Gorbachev. Since the Soviet Union did not want "national problems" interfering with Reagan's trip, the government relaxed its heretofore negative attitude toward manifestations of Jewish culture.

Perezovsky's theory cannot be proven. But it is a fact that, on the eve of Reagan's arrival in Russia, U Yuzefa was given permission to operate.

Perezovsky's troubles, however, did not end there.

Unidentified hooligans smashed windows and smeared the walls with swastikas. He was beaten and shot at by assailants who described themselves as "Russian national patriots." He spent four months in hospital nursing his wounds.

Perezovsky believes that the KGB, in cahoots with homegrown fascists, were behind the attack.

Lately, though, everything has run smoothly. "I have good relations with the police and municipal officials," he said.

Tucked into an alley in the centre of town at 11/17 Ul. Dubininskaya, the U Yuzefa features an extensive menu of traditional Jewish appetizers, meat, fowl and fish dishes, salads, desserts and hard liquor. A full-course meal costs the equivalent of $25 (US)

Strictly speaking, the U Yuzefa is not kosher. Perezovsky claims that it can be, and has been, "koshered" for special banquets.

It's a cosy place, with 10 tables and a well-stocked bar set off by a conspicuous aquarium. On the wall is a large portrait of Sholem Aleichem. Further back are Israeli flags.

Business is generally good, but taxes take a big bite out of profits. It remains to be seen how it will fare after Bukharov's kosher sit-down restaurant opens and competes head-to-head with the U Yuzefa.

A ray of hope

By JOSE ROSENFELD

It is a ray of hope for immigrants that would revolutionize the economy, propelling Israel into the 21st century as a powerhouse among small nations. It is a way to create 500 new high-tech industries in only five years — independent of government largesse.

Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin has been presented with a master plan for immigrant employment by a committee he appointed. Six U.S. Nobel Prize laureates in physics, chemistry and medicine have signed a letter to Rabin urging him to implement it.

Committee chair Herman Branover, a physics professor at Ben-Gurion University, believes the plan provides concrete employment solutions to the huge population of immigrant academics. He sees the lack of appropriate employment opportunities for newcomers as the barrier to immigration.

The five-year proposal would generate 130,000 new jobs at a cost of more than $2 billion. This is significantly less than the tax revenue the plan would generate, not to speak of the economic wealth that will be created, said Branover.

Up to now, efforts to absorb immigrants into the work force have been built on existing marketplace demands. But, Branover points out, the jobs on the market are a total mismatch to the skills of the immigrant work force. Most jobs available are for unskilled workers, while most immigrants are academics and professionals.

Under these circumstances, "the economy as it presently exists cannot absorb 50,000 engineers, 12,000 doctors and thousands of other professionals already here, let alone attract more immigrants," he said.

The only way out of this gloomy situation is to create opportunities that better fit the skills the immigrants bring to the country, he believes.

The creation of high-skill jobs is critical on a human level, too. Branover explains that "the only thing people had in the Soviet Union was their profession. They did not have money, ideology, religion or anything else. If you take away their profession, you take away their dignity."

The know-how and training of the immigrant academics represent a tremendous resource that could transform the economy. Their education alone amounts to a $15 billion investment, excluding the value of their inventions, training and work experience.

The Branover committee's mandate was to build solutions based on free-market principles and avoid salary subsidies or public work initiatives. "We did not want work subsidies because after a couple of years, when the subsidy ends, what happens to the job?" Branover reasoned. "If we were to go with salary subsidies, the cost of the program would run into billions of shekels."

The plan also addresses the employment needs of teachers, artists and members of other liberal professions, with a special focus on doctors. For example, it recommends retraining immigrant physicians in fields that are in high demand and assisting them in opening private practices.

Branover noted that many top Russian industrial research outfits which developed sophisticated Soviet weapons systems are already looking to Israel for joint ventures in projects based on civilian application of military technology. He said these high-tech projects should be especially attractive to investors since the product has already been developed.

The plan still requires a major commitment from the government for its success. The government will have to provide training for the immigrants to work in a commercial environment. It must also prepare managers, set up a data base of projects and scientists, make tax changes to attract investors and adjust regulations for government export credits. (JPFS)

Inter-religious dialogue is still a new, daring concept in Russia, a country shucking off its atheistic, communist and totalitarian past.

Last autumn, the first such forum, called Facing Each Other, took place in Moscow under the auspices of the World Jewish Congress, the Islamic Centre, the World Russian Congress and the Confederation of Jewish Organizations and Communities (Vaad).

Among the participants were the chief rabbi of Russia, Russian Orthodox church leaders and representatives of Muslims, Seventh Day Adventists, Armenians, Roman Catholics and Buddhists in Russia.

The event also attracted political leaders of the liberal persuasion, scholars and visitors from various parts of the former Soviet Union, Israel and the United States.

At the end of it all, a declaration was issued affirming the participants' commitment to "the ideals of love, peace kindness, justice and toleration."

Messages were received from the Russian government. The president, Boris Yeltsin, declared that Russia "is strong enough to make the extremists lay down their arms." (Less than a month later, Yeltsin crushed a right-wing parliamentary revolt in Moscow with tanks.) The foreign minister, Andrei Kozyrev, voiced hope that the "high spiritual authority of the clergy" would "help mitigate ethnic and other conflicts."

Roman Spector, vice-president of the Vaad, was pleased with the outcome. "Conferences like this foster religious pluralism and real tolerance, which are only now taking root in Russia," he observed.

Mikhail Norfshtein, a professional journalist, is editor of the biggest Jewish newspaper in Belarus, Aviv, based in Minsk. Now 63, he is a graduate of the the Moscow Historical Institute. For 15 years, he worked for military newspapers in the Soviet republic of Belorussia.

Although he never "lost his feelings" as a Jew, Norfshtein considered himself assimilated. But in the old Soviet Union — where national minorities were often patronized and discriminated against — a low Jewish profile was not necessarily the path to nirvana.

He recalls an incident which seemed to crystallize everything. An article he submitted was deemed unpublishable because it contained "too many" Jewish war heroes. Norfshtein knew what was expected; he diluted its Jewish content.

Norfhshtein has edited Aviv since its inception in March 1992. It's a monthly, with an average of 16 pages, and is subsidized by the Israel Information Centre in Minsk. Circulation is 3,000.

He can envisage living in Israel some day, but has no immediate plans to leave. He has a 93-year-old mother in Moscow, and feels he is needed in Minsk.

One can easily understand why Eliahu Valk, Israel's first ambassador to Belarus, is dissatisfied with his embassy quarters in the Hotel Belarus in Minsk.

The lobby and the elevator tell much of the story.

And in the elevator, a buxom female attendant in a white uniform makes her presence felt with a stainless steel pail of steaming hamburgers giving off unpleasant fumes. The odor becomes almost unbearable when the elevator stalls somewhere between the fourth and fifth floors, giving everyone inside a severe case of restlessness.

The land arrangements for my trip to Russia and Belarus were supposed to be taken care of by the Vaad in Moscow. I guess I expected too much. No one, as promised, met me at the airport. Nor was there, as I had anticipated, a program of interviews. I was left high and dry, until I raised my voice and pulled some strings. Apologies were made, but I left Russia with the distinct impression that the Vaad is less than efficient.

Zisman outlines importance of immigrants to Israel

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

Emanuel Zisman

TORONTO — Emanuel Zisman, Labor MK and chair of the Israeli government's immigration and absorption committee, painted a predominately rosy picture for prospective olim in a recent lecture at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue, co-sponsored by the Israel Aliyah Center and Canadian Zionist Federation, central region.

He made no mention of the government's role in the territories until the question-and-answer period following his talk when a listener pointedly asked why "Jews who go to Judea, Samaria and Gaza seem to be discriminated against by the government."

Zisman's reply was detailed and cogent: "It's not true that we cut the help to the new olim," he said. "It is true that this government is determined to finish [the] peace agreement, so [for the government] to help to increase the settlements — No! To push more settlers to go there — No! But the agreement between the [Israeli] government and the PLO is that all the settlements and all the settlers will continue to be under Israeli security during the [next] five years of autonomy.

"The territories under Israeli administration are not an integral part of independent Israel," said Zisman. "Nobody proposed to annex Judea, Samaria and the Gaza Strip. Officially they're under international jurisdiction."

Zisman pointed out that if those areas were to be annexed, Israel's Jewish-Arab ratio would be drastically altered. Israel's population is now 82 per cent Jewish, he noted. Of the country's five and a half million citizens, four and a half million are Jewish. "If we annexed Judea, Samaria and the Gaza Strip [home to two million Arabs and 140,000 Jews], the situation would be four and a half million Jews and three million Arabs."

Israel was created by a 1948 United Nations resolution as a Jewish country "with a Jewish majority forever," Zisman reminded the audience.

Israel is not only a Jewish state; it is also a democratic one, he emphasized. As such, "we must give political rights to all the citizens [both Jewish and Arab]," he said.

Zisman fears that "three million [Arabs] with full political, democratic rights" will result in a situation "the same as South Africa.

"If nine million [Diaspora Jews] came to Israel, maybe it would be different."

In the past four years, Israel has absorbed 550,000 new immigrants, Zisman said, a situation he compared to Ontario taking in one and a half million.

"While the Western world sees immigrants as a burden, we absorb them not only for their sake but for our sake," he said. "They are our guarantee of a strong, flourishing Israel."

Zisman noted that 42 per cent of olim who arrived in the last four years have purchased their own apartments [some — mostly Ethiopian immigrants — with the help of a mortgage for 98 per cent of the purchase price]. Eighty-one per cent of the recent olim are employed, although many are not working in the same field as they were before aliyah, Zisman said. He sees the latter problem as one that will diminish "as [the olim] become more assimilated into Israeli society."

Zisman stressed Israel's role in ensuring Jewish continuity. His lecture was scheduled as part of aliyah month

Calling Jerusalem ...

TORONTO — The Israel Aliyah Centres in Toronto and Montreal will participate in a multi-city satellite hook-up to Jerusalem for an interactive panel discussion on business and employment opportunities in Israel.

The event, to be held Feb. 27 from 2-3 p.m., is part of aliyah month being marked across North America in February.

Also participating in the discussion will be Jewish federations in Boston, New York City, Philadelphia, Chicago, Los Angeles, San Diego, San Francisco, Miami, Detroit, Atlanta and Washington.

Former CNN correspondent Mike Greenspan, will moderate the discussion. Greenspan hosts the cable TV program Jerusalem On Line produced by the World Zionist Organization (of which the Aliyah Centre is a department).

The panel will include business, economics, employment and investment experts. Scheduled guests include Israeli finance minister Avraham "Baiga" Shochat and Uri Gordon, head of the Jewish Agency Aliyah and Klita department.

Jerusalem On Line will rebroadcast the program on over 400 cable stations throughout North America at a later date.

The Toronto event will take place at the Lipa Green Building, 4600 Bathurst St., Willowdale. For further information or to RSVP call the Israel Aliyah Centre at 416-633-4766.

Synagogues urged to respond to members

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A "fee for service" mentality under which people pay professionals to visit the sick is contributing to the problem of the "impersonalized synagogue," a Beth Tzedec audience was told recently.

It's time for large synagogues to change their ways to inspire the commitment and devotion given by members to smaller shuls, Rela Geffen, professor of sociology, Gratz College, Philadelphia, said in the Anne and Michael Firestone Endowed Lecture series at the Beth Tzedec Men's Club breakfast.

During the question period, Geffen suggested that the architects and engineers who belong to Beth Tzedec could "make it a little more homey, and do something with the acoustics so that people could hear each other sing."

She said she was told that Beth Tzedec, the largest Conservative synagogue in North America, has set up a strategic planning committee to consider changes in operation.

One of the causes of the impersonal synagogue, "where people attend rather than participate," is sheer size, Geffen said. "The economy of scale in spiritual areas is not such a great idea."

Small groups within the synagogue are needed "to dower poor brides, to welcome visitors and visit the sick." One of her suggestions was that parents of bar and bat mitzvahs should be welcomed at the door and later asked if they would volunteer to help advise the parents of children due to have their bar and bat mitzvahs the following year.

The "competency barrier" is a problem for those called up to the bimah who do not know how to respond in the proper prayers and their situation has to be treated seriously and sympathetically.

In changing from the small European-style shtiebl to the large North American synagogue, a valuable element has been lost, she said. "Now, in the corporate model, the shul has a boardroom but no living room where the adults can enjoy themselves."

It's an "illusion" that North American synagogues are a vibrant part of Jewish community life, she said. "In fact, a smaller proportion are real members, real devotees, not fee for service members."

The Conservative synagogues should take a lesson from the Orthodox movement "that synagogues should be adult-oriented, not kiddie- oriented," Geffen said.

People who need to be reached include the childless, the empty nesters and the aging.

To illustrate how insensitive some large synagogues can be, she told of her 25-year-old sister's experience when applying for High Holy Day tickets in Kansas City where she had just moved. "My sister was told there was no category for single, unmarried women, but a few days later the shul called back and said she could buy a ticket under the widows' category. Not once was she welcomed as a newcomer to the city should be."

A California Consevative shul is pioneering a system of "para-rabbinics" who help members out in special circumstances. "For example, no bereaved person is allowed to go alone to a funeral home to purchase a casket."

The Adath Jeshurun Synagogue in Philadelphia is training people to talk on the phone to sick people, she said, a task well suited for shut-in seniors.

Foster homes provide hope to Jewish kids

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When she was 15, Rachel, the product of a Jewish home right here in Toronto, was flung down a flight of stairs by her enraged stepfather, and suffered torn cartilage.

That was after she was forced to sign a "contract" stipulating she was not to go near her newborn half-brother, was not to eat with the rest of her family and was to remain in the basement when company was visiting.

Finally, Rachel had had enough. She reported the abuse to Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS), which immediately placed her in the care of a Jewish foster family, with the blessing of her own family.

"People say stuff like that doesn't happen in the Jewish community but I can tell you it does," says Rachel (not her real name), now a bubbly 17-year-old who's hoping to become either a psychologist specializing in adolescent behavior or a lawyer for children's rights, drawing on her own terrible experiences.

At first, being with a foster family "was strange. I was embarrassed living with someone else's family." She stayed with her foster parents for six months. Now, "my best friend is my foster sister and I respect my foster parents more than anyone. If it hadn't been for them, I don't know where I'd be.

"It was all I could have asked for."

Today, Rachel lives with relatives, is finishing math and biology courses for high school credits and has a boyfriend. The rules she must obey this time are to clean up after dinner and take out the recyclables. "And I can go anywhere in the house," she boasts. No smoking and no lying complete the discipline. Her life, she happily notes, is back on track.

"There are still some hard times," Rachel says. "But now, we talk it out."

Even though she's still not allowed to see her half-brother and relations with her parents are strained, life in general, she giggles, "is great." Her relatives and foster family even get together as one big happy family to celebrate Jewish holidays.

JF&CS cites Rachel's story as a model of what successful foster parenting can accomplish, but also to stress the urgent need for more Jewish foster parents.

That's why this week, the week before Purim, has been designated Jewish Foster Parent Recruitment Week, which dovetails with both Purim — when Jews recall their redemption from evil — and with this Shabbat Zachor, when we pray for an end to wickedness and oppression.

There is an ongoing need for Jewish foster homes, explains Shirley Feld of JF&CS.

"We never have kids waiting. Sometimes we ask foster parents to double and even triple up," Feld told The CJN.

JF&CS has 23 foster homes on its roster but needs 30 to be on the safe side, she noted.

The agency can draw on four so-called emergency homes — places where a child can be taken at a moment's notice.

The average stay in a foster home is about six months and children range in age from under one year to 16. There are currently 19 Jewish children in foster care in Metro, Feld says.

The need for Jewish foster homes — not to mention the kind of kids who need them — was discussed in hushed tones when the program for Jewish orphans began right after World War II, she says.

"It's much more open now. Half our job is educating the community."

JF&CS seeks stable Jewish homes where a six-month commitment can be made. Having children the same age as the foster child is obviously welcome.

For more information, call JF&CS at (416) 638-7800.

Shalom Village gets accreditation

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — Since its opening in October 1990, Shalom Village Nursing Home has gained an enviable reputation as being the area's best.

This reputation has now been confirmed by a three-year accreditation recently awarded to the nursing home by The Canadian Hospital Association (CHA).

Accreditation involves membership in the CHA and has to be applied for. It is awarded only after thorough inspection as well as a close look at how well the facility abides by its mission statement.

In other words, explains administrator Sheila Burman, "they look at whether you're doing what you promise in your manuals." For instance, "if you promise to take somebody to the bathroom every two hours, they want to know if that's what you are actually doing."

The CHA examines the quality of the nursing care, cleanliness of kitchens and bathrooms "and basically looks objectively at everything you're doing."

While three-year accreditations are not uncommon, they are rarely given on a first time application.

Not only that, says Burman, but "we are at the very top" of accreditation, while only two others, Baycrest and Mount Sinai Hospital, have been granted four years.

Both Burman and Ruth Goldberg, who recently succeeded Ben Shekter as president of Shalom Village Nursing Home, are elated.

To be awarded a three-year accreditation the very first time you apply is absolutely wonderful, says Goldberg.

A recent letter from the CHA congratulating the board of Shalom Village "on having provided the necessary direction and leadership to achieve this award level," went on to say that "all those associated with Shalom Village can be proud of the care and services delivered there."

To celebrate, there was a party for the 80-plus full- and part-time nursing and other staff, whose work both Goldberg and Burman say is outstanding.

Goldberg describes Burman and director of nursing care, Pat Morden, who is herself an accreditor, as "phenomenal people . . . kind and efficient," without whom this would never have been possible.

One benefit of the accredition is a 33 cents per resident per day subsidy increase. Not, admits Burman, a huge amount, but more than welcome.

She observes, "this year is shaping up as very, very tough" as provincial budget cuts promise "to play havoc with our funding."

However, "we're very lean in management and we do what we have to on far less dollars than other homes for the aged," notes Burman," who has just been named president of the area's newly formed Multicultural Alliance for Seniors and the Aged. And even though the year ahead may be tough, Burman has no doubt that Shalom Village Nursing Home will maintain its standard of excellence.

UJA's Golden Givers serve as role models

TORONTO — United Jewish Appeal (UJA) calls them Golden Givers and their ranks are rapidly increasing.

Since August 1993, UJA has identified over 1,000 men and women with a donation history spanning at least 25 consecutive years. More than a third of them were born before 1920.

This month, these elite leaders of tzedakah will be recognized with specially designed certificates and pins.

Toronto's Golden Givers program was the first in Canada, but not in North America. The concept was introduced in Hollywood, Florida about five years ago, when Dr. Jan Lederman, director of South Broward's Jewish Community Foundation realized that these donors were being ignored. Now, Jewish federations all over the United States are hurriedly following Lederman's lead.

"Across North America today, there must be tens of thousands of Golden Givers," he said.

At UJA Toronto, Golden Givers chairman David Green and campaign associate Avrum Rosensweig have passionately embraced the concept.

"The pioneers of charity are role models for younger community members," noted Green, who is encouraging Golden Givers to submit their personal histories. With little prompting, many are ready to reveal in animated detail the stories that shaped their lives.

Edith Zeidenberg, 63, started working at the age of 10, in order to help support her widowed mother and six siblings. By the time Zeidenberg was 12, she was earning $25 a week — a princely salary at the time — on a factory assembly line. In her home, tzedakah was automatic.

"Anyone who came to the door needing food, sat down with us, even though we didn't have anything ourselves," she remembered.

At 92, Max Rotstein has contributed to charity for nearly 70 years. He arrived in Toronto from Poland in 1920 when he was 16, found a job as an electrician two weeks later, and has been a donor ever since. Rotstein, who still shovels snow outside the home he built 63 years ago, retired in 1990. His philosophy of tzedakah is simple.

"I was making money and it was my duty to return some of it to the community."

Seventy years ago, Lou Talsky, soon to be 90, stepped off a train in Hamilton, a 19 year old Russian orphan. One day later, before he could even figure out exactly where Hamilton was, Talsky found a job removing ashes from coal used to heat homes. After working at other occupations, he finally opened a wholesale fruit business and moved to Toronto.

Talsky started contributing to the community before UJA existed, because "I felt it was necessary to help Jewish causes, especially Israel, in any way I could."

With 1,000 donors like Zeidenberg, Rotstein and Talsky, UJA's David Green is buoyant about the success of Toronto's Golden Givers program.

HU launches program

TORONTO — The Hebrew University of Jerusalem's Rothberg School for Overseas Students is launching its first International Summer Institute for Graduate and Post-Graduate Students this year with four credit courses to be given in English.

The Rothberg School, which has a well-established undergraduate program, opened a graduate student department this academic year. There are now 200 graduate students, including seven Canadians, studying there.

The summer institute will feature three seminars in the Humanities and Social Sciences to be offered from August 1 to 18:

•Jewish and Christian Mysticism: Comparative Dimensions will be taught by Prof. Moshe Idel of the Hebrew University and Prof. Bernard McGinn of the University of Chicago.

•The Dreyfus Affair: Meaning, Memory and Myth will be taught by Prof. Robert Wistrich of the Hebrew University and Prof. Nelly Wilson of the University of Bristol.

Education conference

TORONTO — The Second Regional Mini-CAJE (Coalition for the Advancement of Jewish Education) Conference in Toronto Feb. 20-21 will discuss a variety of topics related to Jewish education.

The conference at the Keele Street Campus of York University brings together teachers, principals, rabbis, cantors, school counsellors, youth workers, academics, camp personnel and consultants in Jewish education.

CAJE is a New York-based organization with a membership of several thousand in the United States and Canada. The Toronto conference is a smaller version of the five-day conference held annually by the international CAJE organization at university campuses across North America.

The regional conference will feature lectures, workshops, exhibits of textbooks and audio-visual materials and other programs to update participants about developments in Jewish educational philosophies, approaches to Hebrew language instruction and methodologies for the teaching of Jewish school curricula.

In addition, there will be sessions devoted to Torah Lishma (Torah for its own sake), which will study biblical and rabbinic texts, Jewish history, Jewish practices, Hebrew literature, and Jewish thought.

A total of 74 presenters, including a number of York University faculty members, will participate in 97 separate sessions covering such topics as pre-school education, the use of computers, Women in the Bible, Holocaust education, family education, Sephardic culture, and bio-medical ethics and Jewish law.

The conference is co-sponsored by the Board of Jewish Education (BJE), the Centre for Jewish Studies at York University, and the Day and Supplementary School Principals' Councils affiliated with the BJE. It is supported by the Secretary of State for Multiculturalism through the Heritage Canada Program, and by the Bequests and Endowment Fund of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto.

Greeting conference participants on behalf of BJE will be Rabbi Irwin Witty, executive director, and Yael Seliger, director of teacher placement and personnel practices.

The conference is open to all members of the Toronto Jewish community. There is a nominal registration fee of $12.

Participants will come from Toronto, as well as from other communities in Ontario and the northeastern United States.

For more information call Noreen Nisker at (416) 781-8989 or the BJE at (416) 633-7770.

Israeli work/study program set

NEW YORK — Livnot U'Lehibanot (To Build and To Be Built), a three-month work and study program in Israel, is accepting applications for the spring programs beginning March 6 in both ancient Safed and historic Jerusalem. By literally "digging into your roots," participants between the ages of 21 and 30 are introduced to the foundations of Jewish tradition. Livnot offers an intense course of study in modern Jewish and Israeli history as well as traditional philosophy and customs. In addition to the classes, participants work on building and community service projects and go on bi-weekly hikes throughout the country.

The highlights of the program include a three-day hike from the Sea of Galilee to the Mediterranean Sea, a desert hike in the Negev and seminars in both Safed and Jerusalem.

The program offers group, home hospitality and free shabbat experiences. The cost of the program is $1,150 which includes room and board, tours and hikes. Discounted group airfare and limited scholarships are available. Programs run year round beginning in March, June, September and December.

For more information, please call 212-752-2390 or write to Livnot U'Lehibanot, 110 East 59th Street, 3rd floor, NYC, NY 10022.

Ten years ago, with the help and advice of Irving Levine of the American Jewish Committee, she established the National Coalition Building Institute (NCBI), an organization dedicated to fostering good relations among a variety of groups. "I felt the need for a bridge-building organization made up of all those groups," Brown told The CJN.

Brown was in Toronto recently to help lead a three-day seminar sponsored by the Toronto chapter of NCBI. The goal of the seminar was to "train the trainers" — pass along the methodology developed by the NCBI that would assist people in going back to their communities and holding prejudice-reduction workshops and programs in a variety of settings. Among them are the workplace, churches, labor unions with police and in educational institutions.

They represented various ethnic groups and organizations such as Family Services Association, a community-based group that deals with immigrants, George Brown College and the Unitarian Church.

The goal of the training workshops is to give participants the skills they need to heighten the awareness of others to issues of prejudice and discrimination, Brown said. One powerful tool in the NCBI arsenal is the "speak out" program where participants tell personal stories of their experiences with racism, sexism or anti-Semitism.

Seminar participants were also asked to examine stereotypes and misconception they may hold of others while other techniques demonstrate to participants how to respond to racist jokes.

The ultimate goal of NCBI is to work towards "social justice and the empowerment of the individual so they can work towards social change," Brown said.

"Our work is attitudinal change and empowering people to do the work," Brown said. It operates parallel to legal avenues, such as human rights hearings, that challenge discriminatory practices.

Brown said the organization has not avoided tackling the thorniest of issues. It has worked with the Ku Klux Klan and skinheads in the United States and it's tried to heal the wounds in the Los Angeles area created by the Rodney King affair and the Reginald Denny trial.

Asked if she was discouraged by the polarization between blacks and Jews in the United States, Brown conceded "It is painful, it is difficult, but I have hope."

Blacks and Jews have been pitted against each other by economic and social issues, she said. "Hopefully, the blacks and Jews will reverse this trend. We are natural allies. We have no better place to go but to each other's arms."

Brown said NCBI's agenda includes intra-community work, including within the Jewish community. "There are divisions among Jews over Israel, over who is a good Jew religiously, with regard to gays and lesbians and over women's roles," she said.

Brown, who has held seminars in Montreal involving police and black leaders, said she also travelled to Israel in the 1970s where she participated in efforts in Neve Shalom to bring Jews and Arabs closer together.

"I believe strongly in tikkun olam, repairing the universe," she said. Her Jewish upbringing, she continued, instilled in her a concern for social justice and the desire to eliminate prejudice.

"People don't grow up being taught bridge-building skills," she said. "I want to see people treat each other the way they should."

WHEN IT COMES TO RRSPs, WE HAVE SOMETHING NO ONE ELSE HAS.

US.

What makes one RRSP different from another? At Scotiabank, we think it's people. Our people.

No matter what kind of plan you're looking for, we'll help you get the most out of your retirement savings.

Scotia RRSPs
A Secure Future. Made to Measure.

And the way we do this is simple. We spend time with you. Walk into any Scotiabank Branch and it won't matter if you're new to RRSPs or a seasoned investor, because we're ready to sit down and work out a plan with you.

We'll explain our deposit RRSPs that provide a secure investment while offering competitive rates. Ask about our 1/2% bonus interest offer on our Guaranteed Rate Investments.

Or perhaps Scotia Mutual Funds are something to consider. There are now eleven 100% RRSP-eligible mutual funds.

For the more knowledgeable investor, there's also the option of a Scotia Self-Directed RRSP.

We can discuss ways to help finance a contribution. Like a personal loan at our best rate. Or our Pay Yourself Too Plan® that lets you contribute on a monthly basis.

Of course, there's a lot more we can do. And will do. Because at Scotiabank we know it's not just RRSPs you're interested in. It's your future.

Rabbi Soloveitchik's views and life explored at lecture

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The story of a Jewish spiritual leader who never set foot inside a school until he was 22 enthralled an audience recently at Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT).

The late Rabbi Joseph B. Soloveitchik, born in 1903, was taught by his father and mother at home until he entered the University of Berlin where he took degrees in German philosphy in German and in French philosophy in French.

These and other details of the venerable rabbi who became the dean of Yeshiva University in New York were given in the Ronald Heller Memorial Lecture by Rabbi Hillel Goldberg, editor of the Intermountain Jewish News in Denver, Colo.

Quoting extensively from Rabbi Soloveitchik's 1963 book, A Lonely Man of Faith, his first published in English, Rabbi Goldberg described him "as a Talmudist and an existentialist at the same time."

Though he was successful in practical projects, (he established the first Jewish day school in Boston against formidable odds), Rabbi Soloveitchik was a lonely man who, at times, felt life was incomplete, the lecturer said.

He had a fierce attachment to the afflicted, walking to the synagogue every Saturday with a developmentally disabled young woman, and against protests from his own followers, allowed her to sit on occasion in his seat.

(Earlier, Rabbi Marvin Pachino, headmaster of CHAT, who was one of his students, recalled the tall, straight-backed "Rav," as he was fondly known, rushed out of a class in the Beth Hamidrash at Yeshiva University to a luncheonette across the road to apologize to a student whose arguments he had dismissed only an hour before. On reflection, he had decided the student was right.)

Rabbi Goldberg said Rabbi Soloveitchik's views on secular studies was the most misunderstood part of his work.

"He didn't believe that secular studies were intrinsically valuable, they were valuable only to enhance Talmudic studies."

One of his signal achievements was to set out a policy on inter-faith dialogue which, Rabbi Goldberg said, is followed by the Orthodox movement. "He said we should co-operate with all other people in fighting poverty, in building bridges, but we do not discuss theology, because Judaism can be understod only by Jews. To this day the Orthodox movement does not discuss theology with other faiths."

Susan, an inmate who asked that her real name not be used, did the cooking. She had arrived at the prison after the Passover seder. Rosh Hashanah was her first holiday in prison.

"I thought it was tremendous," she says quietly. "It renewed a lot of the values that are not usually in this institution. It was almost as if you could be what you are no matter where you are."

Norman brought copies of an abbreviated service, as well as a shofar she had bought and tried to learn to blow, with limited success. She says the evening felt more spiritual than being at her own synagogue.

Rosh Hashanah was followed by a joyous Chanukah party. At her own expense, Sheldon bought all the necessities: dreidels, candles, chocolate gelt, Chanukah cookie cutters, cards and invitations. Susan baked cookies and made latkes.

Plans for this year's seder are under way. And though some prisoners will move on, the Ottawa women intend to celebrate the holidays at the Prison for Women as long as there are Jewish inmates.

"To me this is what being Jewish is all about," says Norman. "To me being Jewish means being part of the Jewish family."

Brain power: use it or lose it

TORONTO — "If you want to keep your brain alive and fit for further learning, the easiest prescription is to use it," Yadin Dudai, a professor at the Weizmann Institute of Science, said here recently.

He gave this advice not only to aging people afraid of losing their memory, but to anyone interested in learning new things and keeping their brain active.

At a meeting at the Park Plaza Hotel sponsored by the Weizmann Women for Science and the Rotman Research Institute of Baycrest Centre, Dudai said the Weizmann Institute at Rehovot, Israel, is focusing on how short-term memory is converted into long-term memory.

Dudai is the Sara and Michael Sela Professor of Neurobiology and the Dean, faculty of biology. He lectured earlier in the day at the University of Toronto.

Asked to comment on people who have little memory of new events but a good memory of events in the past, Dudai said it is possible that recent damage to the limbic system of the brain has impaired the memory process, but not affected the existing memories. The limbic system includes the neocortex or cortical mantle, and the hippocampus.

As an illustration, Dudai spoke of a patient he had seen earlier in the day at Baycrest Centre who could not remember who his doctor on staff was 10 minutes after he met him.

In reply to another question, the Weizmann scientist said calculators can be very useful to children learning arithmetic, but only after they themselves have learned to do the basic calculations first.

What turns short-term memories into long-term memories is a fascinating study, he said, involving a "judge" in the brain which decides which memories are important. How proteins are used in the chemical processes affecting millions of brain cells is being studied in the Rehovot labs.

Ending his lecture on a lighter note, Dudai declared: "I know very little about drugs that enhance memory, but my personal bias is toward chocolate."

A moment's silence was observed in memory of Prof. Hannah Farkas-Himsley who died in Israel a few weeks ago. (CJN, Feb. 10). — B.R.

Sports reporter garners provincial award

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Remember the days when sports stories were simply that — lightweight accounts about big games or colorful features about prominent athletes and coaches.

Times have certainly changed. A perusal of a daily newspaper these days is as likely to turn up an item about the business of sport or a discussion about contracts and free agency as it would a feature about an athlete or a game.

Today's readers want reporting with more depth as well as a look behind the scenes of the world of athletics, both at the professional and amateur levels.

Over the past 25 years, David Grossman has carved a niche for himself in reporting high school sports, and he has made a lot of friends — and even some enemies — by his pull-no-punches attitude.

Grossman, who writes for the Toronto Star and who appears weekly on The FAN all-sports radio, was honored recently with a Provincial Sports and Fitness Citation, presented by the government of Ontario, for being a leader in reporting amateur sports.

For Grossman, the award was the pinnacle of a career that began in high school when, as a student at Parkdale Collegiate, he called in basketball scores to a reporter at the Globe and Mail.

From those humble beginnings, he expanded to include the Telegram and the Star, and was soon earning $1.50 — 50 cents each, for his calls.

"I enjoyed it," he recalled recently over a bagel and coffee at a Toronto eatery. "I enjoyed calling in the score and finding out about the athletes. I became a high school reporter for CHUM [radio] and then CFRB.

"I got hooked on it."

Thanks to a break from Jim Vipond, former sports editor at the Globe and Mail, Grossman got a job as a copy boy and eventually worked his way up to greater things. His first big assignment was to report on a high school soccer match between Western Tech and Central Tech. "I must have been 10 feet off the ground," he recalls.

While working at the newspaper, Grossman attended Humber College. He credits his mother, Sally, for supporting him and giving him the confidence he needed to juggle a job and school.

His beat has remained high school athletics since those days in the late 1960s, but today it has expanded to include sports like cricket, equestrian, even riflerly programs — 40 sports in all.

Girls' athletics have increased, and not just in traditional areas. They're just as likely to be into rugby, hockey and wrestling as anything else, he said.

Grossman said that his bailiwick now encompasses about 250 schools from Halton to Durham, including the Toronto area and York Region. While the Star makes a point of carrying school sports, thereby appealing to a new generation of readers, he points to papers in Detroit, Washington and Boston as having one or two pages devoted exclusively to that market.

Grossman said that like other reporters, he has to maintain his credibility and that means reporting on issues that sometimes irk the powers that be. Five years ago, he penned a story about high school kids on steroids (it's still happening, but it's not rampant, he said) and of kids attending sporting events carrying knives and sticks.

Security bill

A story two years ago focused on a $15,000 bill for security run up at a provincial high school track meet, which was patrolled by plainclothes cops, the drug squad, the canine and mounted units.

Sports governing bodies often would like to see amateur sports painted in rosy colors and they become uncomfortable when they see harder-hitting items in print, Grossman said.

His reporting has made him a persona non grata in one North York high school. That resulted from his expose of a 21-year-old playing basketball against 17- and 18-year-olds in other schools.

"I think that the school system has a responsibility to ensure that the kids are there primarily for an education and that if you don't pass, you don't play sports," he said.

Grossman has also tackled the thorny issue of scholarships and the winning-at-all-costs mentality that has entered high school sports.

That attitude has seeped down to the elementary school level where parental abuse of minor hockey referees is a real problem, he said.

Another story he's proud of, focused on a high school hockey tournament where the referee ejected several players after he detected liquor on their breaths. The story angered the tournament organizer, who called on participants to avoid talking to the Star.

Grossman acknowledges that such criticism used to bother him, but now he's less affected by it.

"I said, no dammit. I have a job to do and a responsibility and I'm going to do it."

Peace deal gets mixed reviews

Professor foresees political, economic ties with Arabs

By AMY SATTIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Israel is on the brink of a radical new era in relations with its Arab neighbors, says one Mideast political scientist.

Dr. Bruce Maddy-Weitzman of Tel Aviv University's Moshe Dayan Centre for Middle Eastern and African Studies said he believes Israel will soon forge strong political and economic ties with the surrounding Arab countries.

"Israel is a regional player," he said in a recent lecture sponsored by the continuing education committee of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, the Institute for International Affairs of B'nai Brith Canada, the Foundation for Middle East Studies and Canadian Friends of Tel Aviv University.

The lecture was the third and last in a series titled Assessing Israel's Peace Dividend. More than 60 people attended.

Maddy-Weitzman said new political and economic realities have forced Arab countries to rethink their view of Israel. He pointed to the declining value of oil, the upheaval caused by the Gulf War and the need to "cozy up" to the West as the impetus for normalizing Arab-Israeli relations.

"The only alternative for their own survival as regimes and for the survival of their people was to align themselves with the West," said Maddy-Weitzman, originally from Syracuse, N.Y.

"And the peace process was on the agenda of the West."

He said the number of Arab contingents at the Madrid peace talks in the autumn of 1991 was a sign of the times.

"Even the Algerians were there, and God knows we've never heard anything good about Israel coming out of Algeria."

Maddy-Weitzman said the long-standing pan-Arab confederation is declining, as independent states begin looking out for themselves.

"Qatar is selling natural gas to Israel. The thinking seems to be 'if it's in our interest, let's do it.' "

Chief among those interests are those of Syria and Jordan. Maddy-Weitzman said Jordan is sending a clear message that it wants "a warm peace with all the trappings," including treaties on water managment and tourism. However, Maddy-Weitzman said Jordan will not sign anything lest it appear to its allies to be cutting a separate deal with Israel.

As for the possibility of a Syrian-Israeli peace agreement, the declaration of Syrian president Hafez al-Assad on live television that peace with Israel is a "strategic choice" bodes well, said Maddy-Weitzman.

One of those choices would be the return of the Golan Heights. Maddy-Weitzman said, in order to reabsorb the Golan, Syria would have to disarm the Hezbollah to ensure the security of northern Israel.

Israel's Rabbi Gold says agreement will lead to destruction of Israel

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — In what he claimed to be one of the most painful addresses he has ever had to make, Rabbi Sholom Gold, an Israeli rabbi and dean of Jerusalem College of Adults, said recently that the Israel-PLO peace agreement holds within it the seeds of Israel's destruction.

Speaking at a lecture sponsored by Mizrachi of Canada and Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Congregation adult education committee, Rabbi Gold, former rabbi of Toronto's B'nai Torah Congregation and Yeshiva Ner Yisroel, said that he believes he is speaking on behalf of the majority of Israeli Jews.

"Those of us on the right have been viciously maligned as being opposed to peace," he said. "I am not opposed to peace, I pray for peace, but I am opposed to this peace. This is not a peace plan. It is a mistake to deal with [Yasser] Arafat, who has broken every agreement he has ever made with Arab states. What hope do we have that he will be held to the letter of the law on this agreement? Every stage of autonomy should have been tested. We have to be certain we can go from one step to the next."

Rabbi Gold, the member of a recently formed group representing the rabbinic voice of Israel, said that it is a group whose message is one of pain.

"We believe that the handshake was a criminal act that left no room for manoevre. No Jew has the right to think it is not his struggle. It is everyone's struggle."

With obvious emotion, Rabbi Gold said that the peace plan has caused a deep rift unparalleled in modern history, one that will take decades to heal and, in the process, will weaken Israel's security system.

He said that since the agreement was signed, Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin "has not had the decency to face the nation. We are being fed by rumor, not by fact, and the people have a right to know how far he will go. Government ministers seem to be able to smile and socialize with every Palestinian but they cannot speak to the Israelis. More than five months into the process and we are not told anything."

Rabbi Gold said that Israeli lives have changed dramatically since the handshake on the White House lawn, from disbelief to bereavement and mourning and now to anger.

"This anger is being chanelled in constitutional ways. Tens of thousands of people are on the streets demonstrating and the streets belong to the right. We are going to let our voices be heard."

Asked what his peace plan would be, Rabbi Gold replied that Palestinians should get personal autonomy, not geographical autonomy. "Let them lead their own lives, but not have sovereignty over the land. The moment you give them sovereignty over the land, it is their land. According to the Camp David Accords, the land belongs to us."

Training and experience play a key role in North Toronto Mazda's success

North Toronto Mazda is a division of Autocars North, which has served the area for 15 years. Both the Sales and Service departments draw on this experience to offer each customer an exceptionally high level of service.

Since 1984 Success Training and Management, our training arm, has trained hundreds of sales staff, sales managers, service advisors and business managers for dealers across Canada.

Pauline Kamin has been with the company for 15 years. Not only is her sales volume among the highest; she is also known for providing friendly and professional service. Both Pauline Kamin and Mark Mayer live within five minutes of the dealership, making it easy for them to be available at all times.

North Toronto Mazda is the only Mazda dealership offering a free service clinic for all new Mazda owners. At this clinic, the service manager discusses the technical aspects of the vehicle and how to properly maintain it, covering everything from fixing a flat tire to warranty coverage.

North Toronto Mazda offers a shuttle service and a modern drive-through for your comfort and ease. A personalized maintenance follow-up program is also provided.

North Toronto Mazda will feature the 1995 Millenia, the new Mazda luxury sedan. Also available are the Protege and 323, both top sellers, rated by the C.A.A. as one of the most reliable vehicles in Canada for the lowest number of breakdowns, high resale value and overall customer satisfaction. The MPV family van, now in its fifth year of production, has a proven track record and is the No. 1 selling import mini-van.

The new 626 and MX-6 have standard dual air bags and optional anti-lock brakes system (ABS) as safety features. The MX-3 Precidia has been upgraded for 1994 featuring dual airbags and anti-lock brakes as available options.

For the first time in Canada, a fine hotel offers an in-house glatt kosher restaurant.

London JSU launches group for grad students at UWO

By MARA KOVEN
CJN Correspondent

LONDON — The Jewish Student Union at the University of Western Ontario serves approximately 3,000 undergraduate students, but graduate students are rediscovering a group to call their own.

The revitalized Jewish Graduate and Professional Student Society (JGPSS) recently held a Shabbat dinner at the London Jewish Community Centre. Organizers said they were surprised 74 students showed up. This reflects approximately 20 per cent of the total graduate student population at the university.

The JGPSS is "filling an important need on campus," said chair Lee Birbrager. The group is funded by the Jewish Student Union and national and local Federation.

Word-of-mouth and electronic mail were used to advertise the event. The evening featured a Shabbat service, traditional chicken dinner and speaker Susan Jackson, director of community and youth activities for Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, who spoke about the transition from school to "real life."

Jackson is an alumnus of University of Western Ontario as well as past youth director of Congregation Or Shalom. She knows about Jewish student life in London and urged her audience to start asking questions about their identity.

"Your lives are very busy now — research papers, exams, practicum terms take a lot of time. But soon, you may find yourself starting a new career in a small town. Ever hear of Marathon, Ont.?"

Jackson said a Jewish family living there called her to ask about the closest Passover seder. It was eight hours away in Sault Ste. Marie.

"You never know . . . Many of us take our Jewish identity and the ease of being Jewish for granted. If you live in a large Jewish community like Montreal or Toronto you have a choice of bagel [or] kosher meat stores, restaurants, synagogues and community events." It may not always be that way, she warned.

While developing a professional persona, it is important to develop your ideas about being Jewish, Jackson said. If you have good memories about being Jewish, they just didn't happen. Someone sent you to camp, day school, or moved your family in a Jewish neighborhood, she explained.

Students lingered past 11 p.m. and organizers hope there will be a similar turnout to a billiards evening Feb. 10.

Community undergoing great changes

By ELIZABETH SUMMERFIELD
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — As the Jewish community approaches the end of the 20th century it is witnessing a transformation unlike anything that has occurred since the first century of the Common Era, New York's Centre of Learning and Education education director recently stated.

At that time the conditions under which Jews lived allowed for change, thereby forcing the community to find new ways to express what it meant to be Jewish and to find new institutions to convey the message of what it meant to be Jewish, Rabbi Irwin Kula said in an address at Beth Tzedec Synagogue on the topic of Jewish continuity. The lecture was one of several organized by the New Leadership of the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University.

Rabbi Kula received his Master of Arts and Rabbinics from the Jewish Theological Seminary and now speaks and teaches throughout North America.

Reflecting on the condition of the Jewish people at the end of the 20th century, he called the issue of Jewish continuity "... a new crisis in North American Jewish life." However, he does not see it in the same way most of the senior leadership of North American Jewry does. Much of the leadership, he feels, has spent the last 40 years saving Jews from around the world, but realize that in their own homes, their own children are not a part of the Jewish life they have rescued.

Healthy outlook

"The issue of Jewish continuity, and what does it mean to continue this Jewish people is something at the core of what is meant to be Jewish since Abraham left his homeland," Rabbi Kula explained. He added that since Abraham's time, the Jewish people have been on a search to find out what it really means to be Jewish. This search, he feels, is a healthy outlook on the issue of Jewish continuity.

Stating that Jews are the only people to have survived exile in the world, he added that it is a tremendous accomplishment to have a culture that provides meaning. "Every other people exiled from their land within 150 years was overwhelmed by the dominant culture."

Rabbi Kula said that he believes Jewish renewal has begun. He said that the Judaism that will result will be one with a "tremendous continuity of the past and a unique discontinuity because of what we have gone through." He went on to say that the re-imagining of Judaism which took place 1,000 years ago allowed the Jewish community to be where it is at today.

MORRIS SEIGEL
GM-Grand Salesmaster
Our strategy for 1994 is to be at least equal or better priced than any broker or leasing company.
There is a misconception that so-called brokers can purchase or lease cars for less than an authorized dealer. Nothing can be further from the truth. And, there is far less hassle involved in establishing warranty registration, service, dependability, etc.
Buying or leasing the Parkwood Price is always the Right Price.

Father's long-lost letter provides link with past

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Ariella Blum Samson's father, Zsigmond, was killed during the Holocaust before she was born.

In the turmoil of wartime Hungary, it was a long time before her mother, grandmother and sister even found out for certain that he was dead.

When her mother remarried after the war, her stepfather consciously separated his new family from all traces of Samson's father and his family.

He even went so far as to try to persuade her that he himself was her natural father.

The break might have been complete, except for an ironic twist of fate.

Samson's cousin Yudit, then living in Rehovot, Israel, began cleaning out papers belonging to her father, Samson's paternal uncle Marci, and her grandfather Aladar, who was also Samson's great-uncle.

In the pile appeared a letter from Zsigmond Blum, (actually two letters combined into one) written to his wife after the last time he saw her.

Nobody knew how or when the letter got there. Nobody knew why it was never delivered. Samson, her sister Miriam and her mother, Magda are content that it finally reached its destination.

The letter, reproduced in a deeply moving book by Samson A letter from my father, (Arisa Publishing, 1993) is the letter that must have been written in the hearts of thousands of fathers ripped from their families in the horrors of Hitler's Europe. The one for which survivors pray.

The first part is relatively straightforward. He gives detailed instructions about for whom the new baby should be named, the synagogue service or brit, (even advising which mohel to use, and asking that if one particular one is called, that the other one should be invited — and paid — anyway), that money should be given to the poor, that all the commandments be followed.

It is in the second part where Blum, obviously senses that he would not return from service with Hungary's labor batallion.

In a straightforward and sensible manner, he instructs his wife how to run the business, how to educate the children, how to dispose of the estate, to care for their mothers and the poor. All very businesslike.

But the letter continues. Blum pours out his heart to his wife, whom he calls "my joy," and pleads with her "Think about me often with the same affection as I am thinking of you."

To his daughter Miriam (Sendele) he sends the loving message "may G-d bless you and guard you. You are very close to my heart. You are all my joy..." And to the unborn child, he says "I already love the baby you are carrying under your heart just as much as I love my Sendele."

He asks that his children remain religious, "give tzedaka in such a way that the poor is not embarrassed," that the children, both male and female, learn a means of livelihood.

And he asks that Talmud be studied in his memory.

To Samson, "it brought me incredible peace. I had permission to mourn for the father I never knew. It brought me back to my past, and filled a hole in my life."

Her sister, who had secretly yearned that she would come across him, as you hear in stories, could finally come to terms with the fact that he had died.

The letter, Samson said, proved to Miriam "how much he loved her."

When the story of the letter got around, especially after the publication of the book, more pieces of their past lives began to appear.

Cousins they didn't know survived the war contacted them, reminiscing about the family and sending pictures, pictures Samson had never seen.

But there was sadness too. They found out that their paternal grandparents had survived the war, and actually lived near them in Israel — but they never saw them. And an aunt now in New York says she is not prepared to resume contact.

But at least, Samson says, they got the letter. And just a few weeks ago, one of the newly discovered cousins sent her a letter written by her father to their family just before they left Hungary for America.

Another link with the gentle and loving father she never knew.

Jewish arts community launches directory

By MARA KOVEN
CJN Correspondent

TORONTO — Amidst the swirl of bright colors, the sounds of the Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band and a collage of Jewish artists, the first Jewish Arts Directory (JAD) in Canada was launched Feb. 3 at the Bloor branch of the Jewish Community Centre of Toronto.

Over 130 people attended the launching, which distributed the newly published directory. The idea for the JAD emanated from a cultural forum organized by the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto over two years ago. Jewish artists who attended that forum said they needed a means to communicate to each other and the Jewish community.

Sheldon Disenhouse, chair of cultural services planning and allocation committee of the Federation, told the audience that the directory is a result of a partnership between Jewish artists and the community. "It includes artists that work in the areas of dance, drama, education, film, music, literature and visual arts. This was a hard project to complete, but many dedicated individuals were involved," he said.

Cyrel Troster and Brooky Robbins co-chaired the Federation committee that organized the project. Troster said that the directory "...also [will] be recognized as a resource for planners." There are 298 listings in seven categories of artists who are Jewish or work in Jewish themes. "Although the committee worked hard at encouraging artists to list themselves in the book, many names may be missing. We encourage artists to phone their names into the Jewish Information Service which has put the directory on-line for quick phone access," she said.

Textile artist Temma Gentles, known for her tallesim and being a founding member of the Pomegranate Guild of Judaic Needlework, suggested that this will also be a resource for artists who need other artists for their work. She explained that occasionally she needs a woodwork artisan (who understands how to make poles for a chupah) or a calligrapher. Additionally, the JAD lists Jewish exhibit and gallery spaces, Jewish bookstores, museums, libraries and media. As well, the directory includes a Jewish event calendar and advises artists where they can receive grants for their work.

The Federation-published JAD was funded in part by a grant from the Ontario Ministry of Culture, Tourism and Recreation, a grant from Al Green and a grant from the Shiff Family Philanthropic Fund.

The JAD is available at Jewish bookstores and synagogue gift shops for $6. For more information on the directory, call Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto at 635-2883 ext. 111.

Unlisted artists can receive forms from Jewish Information Services (416) 635-5600, 4600 Bathurst St. Suite 345, North York, Ont. M2R 3V2.

We're Paying Attention

Gregory Hutner (centre) is flanked by his parents, Jo-anne and Ron Hutner and Toronto Blue Jay great Joe Carter, who is deeply involved in the fight against cystic fibrosis.

Jewish activist turns his attention to cystic fibrosis

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Toronto stockbroker Ron Hutner is no stranger to working for good causes.

For some years he was involved with Israel Bonds (he co-chaired the Young Leadership Division) and worked hard for B'nai Brith, where he served as vice-president of Toronto Freedom Lodge.

But these activities pale beside the commitment and dedication he brings to his position as president of the Toronto chapter of the Canadian Cystic Fibrosis Foundation.

Certainly some of his concern arises from the fact that, according to Hutner, cystic fibrosis is the number one killer of children in Canada, second only to cancer. But he has a far more personal interest; his son Gregory was diagnosed with the disease in 1987, at the age of four.

The news stunned Hutner and his wife Jo-anne, who had no hint from either one's family history that cystic fibrosis was a possibility.

"Of course," Hutner noted, "cystic fibrosis was not even recognized as a disease until the late 1930s, so all you heard, was cousin so-and-so had a sister who died young. But you never knew why."

Cystic fibrosis is an inherited genetic disease, where both parents have to be carriers of the gene for a child to have it. It attacks primarily the lungs and/or the digestive system. Thick mucus forms around the organs of the body, literally causing suffocation.

Children need constant care

Symptoms include a constant, mucus-producing cough, excessive appetite but loss of weight, bowel disturbances, a salty taste to the skin, and frequent pneumonia.

Children with this disease need constant care. If the lungs are involved, their chests must be pounded two or three times a day to loosen the mucus and allow it to be coughed up. An inhalation mask used daily distributes antibiotics directly into the lungs.

Hutner explained that the mucus is so thick that bacteria are trapped, grow, and cause infections, which are the chief cause of death.

Most children have digestive problems too. Gregory, for instance, has to take digestive enzymes (in pill form) which break down food as it is eaten, because the mucus prevents it from being used by the system.

He also takes vitamins and antibiotics regularly.

Because these children can't absorb the fat they eat, they are on a high calorie, high fat diet. They may take five pills per meal, with 20 to 30 being taken during the course of a day.

This is a decided improvement, when one considers that at one time, people were taking up to 100 pills a day. (Only fruit or candy doesn't require pills to be digested).

Advances in treatment have also increased the life expectancy from less than 10 years, to over 30 years, with some older cystic fibrosis patients finishing school, marrying and having children.

Gregory, Hutner says, is an excellent student at Upper Canada College, and a star athlete, who plays an hour of sports a day, especially tennis, squash, track and field and soccer.

"He has a number of sports trophies," the proud dad says, adding that he gives a good part of the credit for his son's good health to his active lifestyle.

Gregory is also a student at Holy Blossom Hebrew School, and has a Hebrew tutor as well.

Toronto's Hospital for Sick Children and the University of Toronto, Hutner said, are centres for research into cystic fibrosis. In fact, the most recent advance, the discovery of the actual gene that causes the disease, was made by Toronto's Dr. Lap-Chee Tsui in 1989.

The problem is that while the gene has been located, there is no certainty as to exactly what is wrong with it. As well, there are over 300 mutations of the offending gene to work with.

A new drug has recently been approved in both Canada and the United States, which, it is hoped, will dilute the mucus in the body, so that the patient can breathe easier, and bacteria do not form as readily.

Scientists have also developed a strain of mouse with the disease, so that new treatments can be tested. "This will have a strong impact on research," says Hutner.

Many organizations have donated time and money to cystic fibrosis, including Kinsmen, Zellers, Sun Life, the Toronto Blue Jays, Coca Cola and the Life Underwriters Association of Canada. Shinerama, a yearly event on university campuses, is a prime fundraiser for the cause.

"We are on the edge of major breakthroughs in cystic fibrosis research. We just need the money to make it happen."

Hutner says he does not want accolades for all the work he does on behalf of cystic fibrosis. "I'm just doing what any parent would and should do."

But there is one reward he does want, and he says he won't stop until he gets it. A cure.

For more information, or to find a way to help, call Toronto executive director Cindy Berk, 960-6268, or write 1320 Yonge St., Suite 206, Toronto M4T 1X2.

Cantor Ronald Graner

Composer's lost music included in concert

Filmmaker, musicologist, cantor team up

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Is there an organ walled up in the old Brody Synagogue of Odessa, hidden by order of the Communists after the revolution in 1917? The former synagogue is now a State Archives building but local legend has it that the organ is still there.

This is one of the fascinating mysteries that New York documentary filmmaker David Novack, musicologist Noreen Green and Cantor Ronald Graner of Toronto hope to answer as they work on a film about Jewish composer David Nowakowsky, whose music was lost for 70 years.

Nowakowsky was a giant among Jewish composers of the 19th and early 20th century, the only one to combine music of the western and Oriental world, Graner said.

"Astonishingly his life and body of work are unknown today outside the select world of Jewish musical scholars. Tragically, only one or two of his works were published in his lifetime: Tefilas N'iloh (prayers of the Yom Kippur closing service) in 1895, and Compositions for Sabbath Eve in 1901. Both of these can be heard in synagogue services today."

His work was smuggled out of Russia to Germany by his daughter, Rosa, a concert pianist. Rosa in turn had to flee the German Nazis. Eventually, the 3,500 oratorios, cantatas and chamber pieces were buried in German ammunition cases in Vichy France. A great-grandson, Alexander Seltzman, who helped hide the music and lives at Sciaux, near Paris, brought it to Hebrew Union College in New York.

Graner discovered the discarded Nowakowsky scores while helping to clean up a storage room fire at the college, where he was a student. The long lost music had been stored on a shelf above the sprinkler system and was not destroyed.

The saga comes nearly full circle June 11 in St. Catharines, Ont., when Graner produces a concert of Jewish music including some of Nowakowsky's works and featuring the Iseler Singers, the Canadian Chamber Music Society, four instrumentalists and cantors Thomas Schwartz and Graner as soloists.

It will be presented at Cathedral Ste. Catherines of Alexandria, in co-operation with B'nai Israel Congregation.

When Novack and Green were in Odessa last October for the second International Festival of Jewish Art Music, they learned one of Nowakowsky's former choir singers was living in Moscow. Vladimir Karelli, now 86, started singing under Nowakowsky when he was 8 in the Brody Synagogue choir. Novack flew back to the Russian capital last month to film the veteran chorister and record his reminiscences.

They were disappointed that none of Nowakowsky's music was listed on the Festival program, but Green, who wrote her PhD thesis on the composer, made a presentation that stirred acclaim and brought an invitation to visit Israel. She will return to Odessa later this year to plan a full-scale Nowakowsky concert, and continue the search for the missing Brody Synagogue organ.

Anxious to re-establish Odessa as an international art centre and free port, Ukrainian culture minister Yuri Petrenko arranged for the filmmakers to use the Odessa Opera Hall to rehearse a choir singing one of Nowakowsky's pieces.

The Nowakowsky manuscripts are now under the joint curatorship of the Park Avenue Synagogue of New York, the Hebrew Union College School of Sacred Music in New York, and the David Nowakowsky Foundation in Los Angeles.

BILL GLADSTONE'S

EYE ON ARTS

Al Waxman, who starred in the popular TV series Cagney and Lacey throughout most of the 1980s, commuted regularly between Toronto and Hollywood during those years — and still does whenever he's needed in Tinseltown, which is often. Despite his success, the celebrated actor-director still lives in Toronto, where he recently wrapped up acting in a film for Paramount. "I like Toronto — this is where I was born," he says. "I love the four seasons. I don't even mind this bitterly cold winter that we've just had."

Waxman, who has appeared in many feature films, as well as in the TV series The King of Kensington, is also a talented director whose credits last year included two episodes of the CBS series Sweating Bullets and an episode of Global's Missing Treasures. A teacher of drama and acting at York University, he has long been involved in many philanthropic concerns both within and beyond the Jewish community. Soon he plans to turn his directorial abilities to A Shayna Maidel, a moving drama scheduled to open April 20 at the Studio Theatre of the North York Performing Arts Centre. Written by Barbara Lebow, A Shayna Maidel played off-Broadway several years ago and was an Emmy award-winning made-for-TV film. Toronto theatrical producer, Janese Kane, acquired rights to the play, which has never been performed in Toronto, then approached Waxman last summer.

"The scheduling dovetailed very nicely for me and I found that it's an excellent play — I was quite taken by it," says Waxman. The story concerns two sisters, one from America, one from Poland, who are re-united after World War II and have to deal with deep family secrets as well as their searing experience with the Holocaust.

Dramatic story

Two of six cast members have already been cast: Sharon Birnbaum and Shannon Lawson have signed on as the sisters. As publicist Penny East points out: "A Shayna Maidel literally means a pretty girl, but it refers less to physical attributes than to inner beauty and spirituality. It is an expression of love and hope, qualities that radiate throughout this affecting play."

Tickets start at $25.50 ($17.50 for students and seniors) and may be purchased at the North York Centre Box Office or through TicketMaster, 872-2222.

Black to the Promised Land, a feature-length documentary about American black teens who go to work on a kibbutz in the Golan Heights for three months, won many positive reviews when first shown here last year. The film chronicles the changes in the lives and perceptions of 11 Brooklyn youngsters who take the journey from crowded inner-city ghetto to expansive Israeli countryside. "Whisked off to Israel after a blitz of media attention — glamorous at first, then maddeningly intrusive — the kids are stunned to find themselves in a quiet green world they couldn't have imagined," Michele Landsberg wrote in the Toronto Star. "None of them has ever had a white friend before. Most had vague preconceptions of Jews as ultra-religious and hostile to blacks." For one week beginning Feb. 25, Black to the Promised Land is being shown twice nightly (7 & 9 p.m.) at The Bloor Cinema, 506 Bloor St. W., Toronto.

"In spite of everything, I still believe that people are really good at heart." So penned young Anne Frank (1929-1945) in her famous diary, which records the day-to-day lives of eight fugitives hidden in a few small rooms in Nazi-occupied Amsterdam. First published in 1947, The Diary of Anne Frank has been translated into more than 30 languages and has been adapted for theatre, film and television. A production of the moving play opened earlier this month at the Carousel Theatre in Vancouver. Phone (604) 685-6217 for tickets.

Lack of sight fails to hinder piano technician

Ari Isaac at the piano.

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Ari Isaac became totally blind as a result of glaucoma when he was 18. It took him five years to accept this hard fact.

Eventually Isaac realized that even without sight, life could still be good if he would recognize his limitations. What he really did was circumvent them.

He married, became a father, learned piano tuning and turned outward. Already fluent in Hebrew, Yiddish and German (he was born in Israel of German Jewish parents), he studied Russian and Italian, developing ease in both languages. He also played accordian.

Together with his wife Claire, he rode tandem bicycle, reveling in the motion and a degree of freedom. He listened to classical music and read Braille.

He upgraded to piano technician.

Spurred by extraordinary determination, he turned to woodworking, not just hand carving, but operating power equipment, hardly routine work for a blind man. For two years he was carefully guided by a friend, Dr. Fred Stulberg, who had a home workshop.

With help, Isaac adapted machinery to meet his own requirements and had it installed in his basement. How did he escape injury? "Well, I did cut myself a few times," he admits, "but nothing major. In fact I think I was cut less than most sighted people. I guess I was so scared that I concentrated — a lot!"

Not content with merely constructing occasional pieces, he built full-scale wall units, dining room buffets, even bedroom suites, originally for family and friends, later going into the custom furniture business.

Piano technology continued to intrigue him and he mastered "voicing," a method of adjusting the hammers to bring out the best tone.

"A lot of piano tuners do voicing, but not too many do it successfully," Isaac maintains. "Back in the days of the Heintzmans and Nordheimers, voicing was the cream of the crafts, the most refined aspect of anything to do with piano making."

Intent on eliciting a broader, richer tone color from the instrument, he is now manufacturing hammers in his basement workshop, producing complete sets for pianos in concert halls and music schools. Accomplished musicians in Canada and the United States are using Isaac's custom made hammers which are covered with felt of precise density and resilience. "I have a very clear idea in my head of what I want to hear," he affirms, noting that piano manufacturers offer only mass produced hammers.

Isaac also criss-crosses the continent to give voicing seminars at trade fairs from Maine to California. It's an opportunity to make contacts and market his hammers.

To keep mentally alert and current, he relies on a computer system which is programmed to voice scan any publication he takes from the library.

To keep physically fit, he runs on an indoor treadmill — a gift from his wife Hanna, a teacher at Bialik Hebrew Day School whom he married after the breakdown of his first marriage — or outdoors, alongside Hanna on her bicycle.

Isaac's mind and body are geared to running form, constantly moving, exploring, never remaining still.

"I go on the premise that my hardship and the difficulties it poses are my business. I'm blind and certainly could be better off financially, but I've always been surrounded by great people!"

History Of God: The 4,000 Year Quest of Judaism, Christianity and Islam, by Karen Armstrong (Random House of Canada, $36.00)

Over 90 per cent of North Americans believe in God. At least, that is what public opinion polls and surveys indicate. Yet, in recent years, there has been an unmistakable decline in the influence of organized religion. For an increasing number of people, the idea of a personal God — a deity who is aware of our individual existence and who listens to prayer — is unacceptable for a variety of reasons, moral, intellectual, scientific and spiritual.

It is difficult to accept our nation's overwhelming belief in God with the aimlessness, alienation and violence that is so rife in our society. The escalating crime rate, drug addiction, fragmentation of the nuclear family and erosion of ethical standards are not signs of a spiritually healthy community.

History of God takes the reader on a stimulating journey through time to examine the origins of Judaism, Christianity and Islam, and the later contributions, concerns and debates of philosophers and mystics, rationalists and pietists. In this intellectually challenging work there are salient ideas and essential facts to be gleaned on almost every page.

The author stresses the mystical teachings of the three monotheisic faiths and shows how, more often than theological precepts, they address the basic hopes, fears and spiritual needs of their followers. She points out that a Hebrew synonym for God in the period following the destruction of the Temple was Shekinah which means "to dwell with" or "to pitch one's tent". This mystical aspect of divinity helped Jews exiled from their land to sense God's presence wherever they went.

In the 16th century, Isaac Luria of Safed created a new vision of God, which helped his followers to cultivate a spirit of joy and kindness, together with a positive view of humanity. His imaginative insights came at a time when guilt, anger and a sense of hopelessness could have caused many to despair and lose faith in life altogether.

About a hundred years later Shabbetai Zevi, born in Turkey, claimed to be the long-awaited Jewish messiah. He brought a surge of hope to the hearts of Europe's Jews. "His supporters came from all classes of Jewish society: rich and poor, learned and uneducated. Pamphlets and broadsheets spread the glad tidings in English, Dutch, German and Italian. In the Ottoman empire, prophets wandered through the streets describing visions in which they had seen Shabbetai seated upon a throne. All business ceased; ominously, the Jews of Turkey dropped the name of the sultan from the Sabbath prayers and put in Shabbetai's name instead."

Arrived in 1666

Unhappily, when he arrived in Istanbul in 1666, he was arrested as a rebel and imprisoned. Given the choice of conversion to Islam or death, he chose the former. He was given an imperial pension and died as an apparently loyal Muslim ten years later. This tragic transformation did not deter many of his followers, who continue to believe in him as God's messenger to His people.

In turning to the spiritual malaise of our age, Karen Armstrong is convinced that human beings cannot endure spiritual emptiness and desolation and that they always fill the vacuum by creating a new and useful focus of meaning. Indeed, she writes, "If we are to create a vibrant new faith for the 20th century, we should, perhaps, ponder the history of God for some lessons and warnings."

Armstrong, a former Roman Catholic nun is widely recognized as a brilliant student of comparative religion. She now teaches at the Leo Baeck College for the Study of Judaism and the Training of Rabbis and Teachers.

A History of God is an outstanding achievement. Some of the material on Islam is difficult because it is unfamiliar. But the book generally is lucid and accessible to the intellectually curious and serious reader.

Spielberg's film tops the list

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LOS ANGELES — The Holocaust epic Schindler's List last week was nominated for Academy Awards in 12 categories and is now considered the clear-cut front-runner to earn Oscars for best picture and for its director, Steven Spielberg.

The film, about a German businessman who was a member of the Nazi party and yet saved the lives of his 1,300 Jewish factory workers, also garnered nominations in the top categories for Liam Neeson as best actor, Ralph Fiennes as supporting actor and Steven Zaillian for his screenplay, based on the book by Thomas Keneally.

Twelve nominations for one movie has never been surpassed in the 66-year history of the Academy Awards and has been equalled only once by Ben Hur in 1959.

A win for Spielberg as best director at the March 21 awards would be sweet recompense for the Academy's previous snubs of the most successful commercial filmmaker in Hollywood history.

Actress Winona Ryder, who is Jewish, was nominated as best supporting actress for her role in The Age of Innocence.

TRAVEL TALK

By BILL GLADSTONE

Lillehammer, site of the 1994 Winter Olympic Games, is part of the Troll Park region of Eastern Norway. The area is known for its mountains, wild rivers, national parks and many skiing, hiking and camping opportunities. Situated about 80 km north of Oslo, Lillehammer is convenient to the great forests of the Hedmark region, the country's longest river (the Glomma) and the world's oldest paddle steamer still in operation, the Skibladner.

Oslo, Norway's capital, is a lively cultural centre, with opera, theatre, concert halls and a thriving cafe society. Architecture, folk art, natural history and Norwegian artist Edvard Munch are the focuses of some of its many museums. Most of the country's roughly 1,000 Jews live in Oslo. The earliest Jews arrived only in the middle of the last century. The country's secondary cities include Bergen, known as the gateway to the fiords, the North Sea port of Stavanger, and the central Norwegian town of Trondheim, formerly the capital of a Viking kingdom. Besides its association with fiords and Vikings, Norway is known as the Land of the Midnight Sun. With one-third of its land mass within the Arctic Circle, it is a cold country that most Canadians, presently shivering through a relentless winter, would prefer to see during summer.

Nortra, the Norwegian Tourist Board, is hoping that North Americans will discover Norway just as the Vikings discovered North America some 500 years before Columbus. For further information, write Nortra, 655 Third Avenue, New York 10017 NY.

More European Notes:

Travel AGO, a volunteer travel project of the Art Gallery of Ontario, is hosting a "New Horizons" tour to Eastern Europe, Sept. 15 to Oct. 3. Cities on the itinerary include Prague, Budapest, Warsaw and Crakow, and activities include visits to private art galleries and studios, concerts in Baroque churches, and walks along scenic trails in the Tatra Mountains. Although art and not Jewish history is the focus, it would be hard to visit these cities without learning something of their former Jewish inhabitants and culture.

Travel AGO is also hosting a trip to Spain and Portugal, April 17 to May 1. Highlights include the Prado Museum of Madrid and that city's newly-opened Von Thyssen Gallery and the Royal Palace. Andalusia, Seville, Granada and Cordoba, are also on the itinerary. In Barcelona, the group will experience the magnificent works of art by Miro, Picasso and Gaudi. Lisbon's Gulbenkian Museum and the Sintra coast are also included. For further details on these tours, phone the AGO's volunteer office, (416) 979-6661.

Communications coach stresses employees' attitude

By LORI DENNIS
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — One of the major contributors to declining productivity is that companies spend millions of dollars on skills training but completely overlook their employees' attitude and effort — the other side of the equation necessary for developing strong communication skills, says a Toronto business communications specialist.

"A person's performance is based on a combination of aptitude and attitude. Big dollars are invested in training people's skills. But what time and money do companies invest in coaching people's attitude and effort?" asks Vera Held of VNH Communications. "One without the other is simply a bandaid solution," she says.

Held, a niche consultant, speaker and writer who works with organizations like Bell Canada, Bombardier, TD Bank, Glaxo, and Ernst and Young, has recently hooked up with psychologist Dr. John Marshall of the Self-Management Group. Using Marshall's performance model, Held has developed a unique communications application program designed to focus on thinking and communication errors related to listening, speaking, writing and judgement.

"As a communications coach, I help people both on a one-on-one and team basis to build their communication strengths and manage their communication weaknesses. They get in touch with the communication activities they do well and reinforce them, so competency becomes a habit. And they learn how to rise above their weaknesses by communicating with heart which can take them from being listening 'impaired' to listening 'repaired' for example," Held explains.

One of her many services that she claims is becoming indispensable to the corporate world is what she calls a communications audit — teaching people how to use technology in a more effective and a more human way.

"Instead of taking the time to really understand what place technology needs to play in our corporate lives, we've allowed it to invade our world so fast and furiously that no one has developed protocol on how to use this technology. I've seen people have down and dirty nights on E-mail which is certainly not an appropriate place to let loose," Held explains.

Vera Held

"Few of us have really thought about when is the right time to fax, to use E-mail or voice mail to write a letter, to pop your head around the corner, or to have lunch with a colleague. What methods of communication are best in which instance? What form is appropriate for what kind of message? Is your company E-mail heavy? Voice mail light? And how does that impact your bottom line?" Held asks.

She conducts application seminars based on real-life case studies to help companies avoid overload, overuse, multiple copies, blind copies, emotional fighting, message retrieval, and duplicating messages by using more than one medium. Using solid judgement with technology helps companies save time, money, potential legal.

Held also helps employees improve upon their communications skills — writing, speaking and listening. "People who write well, do well; clear concise writing is almost universally accepted as evidence of excellent thinking. Presenting your ideas orally is equally important to make an impact in business. And listening well is often one of the biggest challenges facing us in our quest to communicate effectively," she explains.

"While hearing is a can issue, listening is a will issue. So once again, attitudes must be changed before listening can really take place. The Chinese pictogram for listening is an ear and a heart. Although only 18 inches separate the two, they don't always work in tandem. A Chinese proverb says, 'He who listens with ear and heart is a true listener."

Held, who was born to working class parents and is the first-born daughter of a Holocaust survivor, believes her work stems from her strong value system. "I believe in human decency and I work hard to instill that in others," she says.

She believes that our mandate for the 90's and beyond is to "get off our conservative duffs, put our lateral thinking caps on and do business in a brand new way, preparing ourselves to adapt our communications style to meet the changing needs in the marketplace."

Sunlight cleans dirty water

REHOVOT — Highly concentrated sunlight seems to effectively purify contaminated water, according to Israeli research.

This is of considerable significance because many of the dangerous pollutants that contaminate surface and undergrtound water are not broken down by the usual water-treatment procedures such as chlorination, oxygenation or ozonization.

Professor Emeritus Mordechai Halmann of Israel's Weizmann Institute tested the application of light-assisted catalytic degradation of a variety of pesticides, herbicides, urea derivatives and halocarbons — all organic pollutants that commonly find their way into vital water resources.

Halmann worked with groundwater from a severly poluted well along Israel's coastal aquifer. Of the 14 different contaminants, 12 decreased to negligible levels. The remaining two were also reduced, but to a lesser degree. A detailed series of follow-up experiments confirmed the results.

Oscardo has doing business with Mexico all tied up

By DEBBIE LIGHTSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — If you think a tie is a tie is a tie, a visit to Oscardo Inc. on Dufferin Street south of Lawrence will quickly change your mind.

The walls and tables of the company boardroom are draped with neckwear ranging from traditional geometrics and abstracts, to colorful cartoons of the Pink Panther and Inspector Clouseau, to limited edition ties featuring the paintings of Gary Silverberg, the back of each one numbered, like a lithograph.

"When it comes to clothing, ties are the only way men have to communicate, to show their emotions," says Oscar Lulka, vice-president of sales.

The firm's name is a blend of his and that of his older brother Eduardo, the company's president, who smilingly admits he wears their more conservative designs.

Oscar, in contrast, favors the new Silverberg line, which illustrates the corporate man's working life with humorous and ironic scenes like the Last Power Breakfast (men around a boardroom table) or He Who Would Be King (a modern-day knight trying to pull a tie out of the boardroom table rather than a sword out of a stone).

At its facility on Dufferin Street, Oscardo manufacturers some 400,000 ties a year, which retail for $15 and up for polyester and $25 to $60 for silk. The firm's customers range from K-Mart to Sears, The Bay, Eaton's, Tip Top and Jack Fraser, as well as many independent stores and boutiques.

Oscardo also fills special orders, for instance, for logo ties for employees of Burger King and the Pickle Barrel, or for specific events, like a recent trade show where they designed ties imprinted with gold and silver faucets for the Moen bathroom fixture company.

Oscardo employs 25 people, 20 in production and five in the front office. They have ten sales representatives across Canada. Eduardo said the company's sales were $2.2 million in '93. This year he is projecting an increase in sales of 30 per cent to $3 million.

The firm is growing, despite having been hit hard by the recession. When the Lulkas bought the tie company in '87, it was geared to mass merchandising. In the past few years, four of the five major companies to whom they had sold 80 per cent of their neckwear, closed down.

Ninety per cent of Oscardo's merchandise is sold in Canada. About 10 per cent is exported to Mexico and Venezuela. And that's where the Lulkas' Mexican connection comes in.

Most of the family immigrated to Toronto from Mexico City in the early '80s. They are very excited by the possibilities opened up by the North American Free Trade Agreement.

"For 35 years Mexico's borders were closed to imports. Now Mexico is open for business!" Eduardo enthused.

He says the Mexicans' business style is very different from the hard-driving, time-is-money, bottom-line approach typical of North Americans.

"In Mexico, someone is not going to buy your product because it's good, but because you are a trustworthy person. They have to build a personal relationship with you first," Eduardo explained.

Added Oscar: "That's why in Mexico we have long business breakfasts and lunches. Only five per cent of that time is spent talking about business; 95 per cent is getting to know each other, talking about yourself, your family, your hobbies, your interests . . . becoming linked, becoming 'compadres'."

The brothers' advice to Canadians trying to penetrate the Mexican market: go slow and easy, be patient; sometimes people won't answer letters or faxes — that's normal, give them time, try again, don't be confrontational; be humble, especially when dealing with government officials, who can be very proud; don't alienate people, don't be too persistent or pushy.

Both Eduardo and Oscar had worked in the garment business in Mexico (as did their father Salomon, now director of Oscardo), but they wanted to away from Mexico City's pollution and congestion.

And they had specific reasons for choosing Canada.

"Coming from Mexico City, I needed a big city. But going to a big city in the United States would not have solved the problem," Eduardo said.

"There is more safety here, less pollution, less traffic . . . and there are still a lot of family values. You still see children living with their parents, even after university. There's a lot more closeness, and our family has always been close," Oscar said.

Another factor in choosing Toronto was its sizable Jewish community.

Eduardo was active in Mexico City's 40,000-member, mainly upper middle class Jewish community. He had served as national president of B'nai Brith, which helped him make his first social and business contacts here.

Eduardo says he was surprised by the strength and outspokeness of Toronto's Jewish community.

For instance, when he first arrived, he was shocked to see signs outside synagogues urging people to buy Israel Bonds or contribute to the United Jewish Appeal. He said Mexico's Jews give generously to Israel, but it's done quietly.

"It's not accepted there, the Mexican community would not see it as nice to openly send money outside the country . . . here the Jewish community is stronger and louder. You can really make a statement . . . I like it. I feel more secure, I can be more open about my Jewishness," he said.

Enjoy tax-deferred growth with an insurance RRSP

By STUART HABER
& NEIL FEIGELSOHN
Special to The CJN

Around the corner is the time of year when everyone and his uncle makes a mad dash for his favorite institution to decrease his taxes and save toward retirement. Decisions abound: Fund mixtures; lengths of term deposits; better returns, higher risks; let's buy new furniture instead — 'tis the season of choices.

The Registered Retirement Savings Plan (RRSP) is, along with certain types of life insurance, one of the last places to enjoy tax-deferred growth. In addition, the RRSP offers, if used correctly, security in the future and a pat on the back in the form of a tax receipt from the government which allows you to keep more of the money you worked hard to earn.

Most people know the banks, trust companies, brokerage houses and credit unions, offer RRSP guidance and products. We have found though that this is less true of insurance companies, probably for two reasons: one, when most people think of insurance companies, they think of insurance (makes sense); second, most people bank at banks, trust companies and credit unions, in whose branches they are met by vivid displays of returns for different retirement saving programs. Insurance companies though do have much to offer, either through legislation or self-regulation, or because of the nature of their interaction with the public, that is, through the interaction between company agent and clients. The forthcoming points should be noted by all of us upon whom our clients rely for advice.

Insurance companies operate under a host of federal and provincial regulations. The Judiciary too plays an important role with respect to the products that we offer, with respect to their integrity and the positions taken by those who sell them. An RRSP at an insurance company offers three rather important elements: outside of probate distribution of funds at death; a higher degree of creditor protection than that found at other institutions; and, regarding the Segregated Funds of many insurance companies (insurance company mutual funds), guarantees in the event of death or maturity.

Currently, in the event of the death of the RRSP owner, the owner's assets pass through probate — the size of his estate is evaluated on a banded basis and correlated with the amount owing for that band, to which is applied a fee which is collected by most provincial governments. The fees were recently increased in Ontario, a trend which will probably continue in the future.

The RRSP at an insurance company, along with those at other institutions with preferred beneficiary designations, avoids these probate fees. To avoid probate fees, an RRSP product at an insurance company needs the naming of a preferred beneficiary. A beneficiary is preferred if it is a husband, wife, daughter, son, grandchild, mother or father. It is important to note though that if transferred to a son or daughter, the funds will be subject to regular income tax.

A phenomenon which unfortunately has become common in recent years is the attachment by creditors to debtors' Retirement Savings accumulations. We have found that many of our clients were under the imprsession that RRSP's could not be touched, in bankruptcy. This is not the case, and the implications are enough to scare anyone. Fortunately, an individual is able to improve the creditor protection of his funds by placing them with an insurance company.

This heightened level of creditor protection is quite significant, assuming that no contravention of the existing Bankruptcy Act can be shown. In whatever form the savings take — from Segregated Funds to Daily Interest Plan — the funds are protected to a greater extent than if they were at any other financial institution. This is true of individual registered savings plans, as well as those owned by individual members as part of a larger group, for example, those owned by participants in a company Group RRSP or Deferred Profit Sharing Plan (DPSP). Assuming that it cannot be shown that the debtor has transferred his funds in avoidance of an inevitable attachment, recent writings have continued to support the special protective status of the insurance company RRSP. The main reason for this is that the RRSP is construed as a future annuity under Insurance regulations, and thus enjoys a protection found at no other type of financial institution.

For those who are willing to enjoy higher returns commensurate with higher risk, there are a plethora of mutual fund options, both among and outside of insurance companies. The insurance company mutual funds, as we mentioned earlier, is called a Segregated Fund. The money in these professionally managed funds is segregated from the general performance of the rest of the company, hence the name. Because of this, and of their own volition, many insurance companies offer guarantees to Segregated Fund investors not found outside of the insurance industry. The guarantees are in the event of death, and in the event of maturity of the RRSP (maturity occurs at the end of the calendar year in which the RRSP owner turns 71).

In the event of the death of the fund holder, most insurance companies will guarantee a minimum of 75 per cent of all deposits made to the fund, less withdrawals, or the value of the decedents holdings in the fund, whichever is higher. Many companies though will guarantee 100 per cent of deposits made at death, less withdrawals. At maturity many companies will guarantee a minimum of 75 per cent of deposits made, less withdrawals, or the value of the decedents holdings in the fund, whichever is higher. We all hope that values will not drop such that people will rely on these guarantees to recoup any losses. However, these guarantees are an added bonus and degree of security for those who wish to enjoy it.

The final area that we feel distinguishes insurance company RRSP's from those of other institutions is the dynamic between the agent and the client. The agent, having intimate knowledge of the client's financial position as necessitated by other planning which may have taken place, along with access to computer technology and training, can offer an excellent service well before the upcoming, harried RRSP season, when everyone else will be rushing to get in their final deposits.

In our opinion, the insurance company RRSP offers an excellent framework for saving, composed of competitive rates of return, industry — specific enhanced protection, guarantees unavailable elsewhere, and an opportunity to develop a relationship with an individual who can advise in retirement and other basic financial security areas. While the above provides a general understanding of the highlights of insurance company RRSPs, we recommend that more detailed discussions take place between individuals and their advisors in order to understand all the benefits of these types of investment opportunities.

Business Briefs

BRONFMAN BACKS ISRAELI FIRMS

Bronfman's firm, Claridge Israel, and a group of investors are raising capital for a $100 million fund to invest in Israeli companies. The fund, expected to be available sometime next month, will also financially support worthy Arab-Israeli projects in the territories.

Hi-tech corporations with strong export potential will be the most likely recipients. Start-up companies need not apply.

GOVERNOR FIGHTS INFLATION

ISRAEL — The Bank of Israel has ignited a debate about inflation by raising interest rates.

Bank Governor Jacob Frenkel considers an eight per cent target ideal for the Israeli economy this year. Studies by both the government and private forecasting organizations had been pointing to nine or 10 per cent.

Israel's Minister of Finance, the country's Manufacturer's Association and the Federation of Israeli Chambers of Commerce are against the interest rate boost. However, like most national central bank directors, Frenkel is worried about galloping prices impeding economic growth.

In Israel, there is historical cause for concern. Just five years ago, inflation was averaging 18.2 per cent, and it has been steadily dropping since then. But even Frenkel's eight per cent goal is considerably higher than in the United States and Canada.

* * *

The Tel Aviv Stock Exchange (TASE) is performing so well that Israel wants a second exchange. So far, five private groups will reportedly submit proposals for this.

Exchange No.2 will abandon the traditional trading floor, in favor of transactions that are computer conducted.

EVERYBODY'S TALKING

ISRAEL — In a country whose residents are famous for speaking about anything and everything, it's not surprising that cellular phone use is expanding rapidly.

In fact, by the end of this year, there could be 200,000 additional cell phone subscribers.

Now, one cellular phone network is not enough, and communications companies are eagerly applying for a stake in a second cell system.

Among the bidders is an alliance of Elbit, Tadiran, and Canadian Telecom. However, the competition is fierce with U.S. giant Bell South aggressively campaigning for a contract.

TERMINAL TWO

ISRAEL— The size of Israel's Ben Gurion Airport hasn't quite caught up with the recent burst of tourism. Therefore, a second terminal has taken on the highest priority status.

Israel's terminal two will include a new hotel and a train station with links to Tel Aviv, Haifa and Jerusalem.

It's expected to be built in four years and serve 10 million passengers annually.

* * *

RUNAWAY BUS

ISRAEL — Unlikely as it sounds, Israel's most prominent public transportation co-operative, Egged is worried about bus heists.

It has developed an original anti-theft device that locks the vehicle's starter, gear shift box and gas tank as soon as the motor is turned off.

A driver gets the bus going again in much the same way as a bank machine operates — with a password and a personal identification number.

The new theft protector will be tested on 12 inter-city buses.

BUSINESS FORUM CONFERENCE

ISRAEL — Business people from Israel and the Diaspora will gather in Jerusalem Feb. 28 to Mar. 2 to discuss business opportunities.

The fourth Business Forum Conference will host international business leaders and public officials including Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, President Ezer Weizman and Jerusalem mayor Ehud Olmert.

For more information, call Michael Sax at 921-5669 or Danny Fleishman at 961-7302.

These business briefs were compiled from information supplied by Israel's Economic Mission in Toronto.

Baycrest brings audiology services to seniors

TORONTO — It's estimated that nearly two of every three people age 65 and over have some degree of hearing impairment. To meet the needs of homebound seniors who live in the community and those in retirement and nursing homes without access to hearing experts, Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care has launched a Community Hearing Health Care service.

"Our goal is to bring a broad range of audiology services to these people and help them live safer, fuller lives," explains Reena Duchowny, an audiologist at Baycrest's department of communication disorders.

Living with impaired hearing can be dangerous for homebound elderly people who may not be able to hear the telephone or a smoke detector alarm. Hearing impairment also reduces their enjoyment of life because they aren't able to hear the television or radio or to participate fully in conversations with friends and family.

"By focusing on the abilities rather than the disabilities of hearing impaired seniors, and by doing realistic evaluations of their needs, we can help clients be more independent," says Duchowny. "By improving their functional hearing ability, we hope to provide greater safety and security for them in their homes."

If a client already has a hearing-aid, the audiologist will evaluate how well it's working. If clients don't have a hearing-aid and they need one, they will be evaluated for one. The service does not include the dispensing of hearing-aids, but can provide a listing of hearing-aid dispensers in the community who offer home service.

The visiting audiologist can also provide training in communication strategies to lessen the impact of hearing impairment — for example, by recommending assistive listening devices such as a visual smoke alarm, special TV amplifier and doorbell alerting system. A qualified technician is also available to install equipment and teach clients how to use these devices.

Available during day, evenings

The service is available during the day and has evening hours. There may be a fee for the visits, and these will be explained before any service is provided. Anyone with a valid health card number who is 55 years or older and who would have trouble travelling to an outside appointment is eligible. The name and address of a family physician are required for reporting purposes, and clients are asked to see their doctor and have their ears cleaned of wax if this hasn't been done within the last three months.

For more information, please call 785-2377 from 9 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. and ask for the Community Hearing Health Care service.

FROM THE EDITOR OF in T.O.

This is the second edition of inT.O., the newsmagazine for young, Jewish Torontonians. The response to our premiere edition was overwhelmingly positive and we appreciate all of the comments, both congratulatory and constructive. We are doing our best to include as many of your suggestions as possible in future issues of inT.O. and hope that you will continue to call with your feedback, at:

HOTLINE
631-5700

You will find some new columns in this issue which we hope to continue, including an interview with a prominent young Jewish business leader in "What's Happening in Business inT.O.", an article on a member of the Toronto community who came to our city from somewhere else in "Who's New inT.O.", reports on events that have occurred in the past months, and community volunteer opportunities. Please let us know what you think of them.

Also, look for continuing features such as our extensive listing of social events, speakers, movies and tours in the "What's On inT.O." column.

inT.O. is a great way to find out about all that our community has to offer.

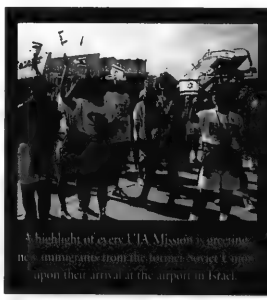
in T.O. Did you Know?

- that thanks to the UJA-funded Jewish Agency for Israel, approximately 7,000 new immigrants continue to arrive in Israel every month, including almost 6,000 from the former Soviet Union?
- that over 1,000 Russian teenagers have immigrated to Israel without their parents to study in UJA-funded Youth Aliyah institutions? They hope to lay the groundwork and encourage their parents to join them in the future.
- that the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto/UJA and the Canadian Jewish Congress recently organized donations of new warm winter clothing and medication from local Jewish manufacturers to be sent to the remaining 685 Jews in Sarajevo? Local synagogues also participated in the effort.
- that UJA provides funding for Jewish student organizations at the University of Toronto, York University and smaller campuses such as Ryerson and Seneca? These organizations are the primary Jewish presence on campus and provide social, religious and political action programming. The national Jewish Students' Network is also funded by UJA.
- that UJA subsidizes the kosher hot lunch program at the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living? This program provides the opportunity for seniors to have one nutritious hot meal daily without worrying about the cost.
- that UJA funds Judaic programming at the Reena Foundation? This allows mentally challenged members of our community to be educated about Judaism and proud of their heritage.



A highlight of every UJA Mission is greeting new immigrants from the former Soviet Union upon their arrival at the airport in Israel.

WHAT'S HAPPENING IN BUSINESS in T.O.

GELATO FRESCO: Subject to Improvement Without Notice

Gary Soren sits in a very low-key, almost rundown office decorated with his brother's paintings and macramé hangings. After about two minutes, you don't notice your surroundings because you are caught up in Gary's excitement about the company he and partner Hart Melvin founded in 1984, Gelato Fresco.

The idea for Gelato Fresco came from Hart's passion for ice cream, which had grown on his frequent visits to California, a state which boasts several high fat, super rich ice creams. Hart's luggage business (Le Sport Sac) was reaching saturation in Toronto and he thought premium ice cream was the product of the future. He enlisted the help of good friend, Gary Soren, who had manufacturing expertise gained through working since graduation from Western in his family's cookware business. Gary jumped on the idea, since the cookware business was also waning, but agreed only on one condition: Gary would help set up the business, but Hart had to make the ice cream.

Hart travelled around Italy to do research but was disappointed again and again until he reached Milan and Umberto where he "became enlightened". He discovered that it was possible to make a product that was high in flavour, and low in fat. He persuaded Elio Martinuzzi of Umberto to let him spend a week learning the business and then came home to practice. Gary was the guinea pig, and because the ingredients were all so fresh, even the rejects tasted pretty good. Not good enough, though. Gary and Hart wanted people to be able to "eat our product in a noisy, dark closet and know what the flavour was".

Getting the flavours right was difficult because they had to create new recipes for each flavour. Gary and Hart wanted to make authentic gelato, and that meant starting from scratch on every product. Milanese Vanilla took the longest (almost five years), since there was nothing to hide, the base flavour of vanilla was the end product. It took almost three years to make a product that Gary felt rivaled Haagen Daz, "the gold standard", and another couple to surpass it Why? Haagen Daz had 16% butterfat, while Gelato Fresco only had10% in vanilla, and less in other flavours (average less than 8%).

Gary explains that the butterfat and high density (low air content) of the products that made Haagen Daz so successful; these ice creams tasted so much richer and better than anything that had existed previously. The amazing thing about Gelato Fresco products is that they taste just as good, if not better than other ice creams, without as much fat. In the early 80s, when Gelato Fresco first started, low fat wasn't a big issue, but as the years went on, low-fat eating became a way of life and Gelato Fresco was well positioned to capitalize on this trend. Gary admits that they didn't plan it; they just "fell into it".

Butterfat and cream are issues Gary feels strongly about. "You don't search the world for the best coffees and pour cream and sugar in, and you don't spend money for the best Scotch and then dilute it with water", he says, "The same holds for ice creams because they aren't diluted". Gary describes their product development process as "taking a flavour and pushing it to the max."

Quality is high and Gary warns that the products are "subject to improvement without notice". It is this high quality which has caused difficulty in obtaining a kosher "COR" designation. The best vegetable stabilizer comes from Italy and Gary says that an "eccentric genius" runs the stabilizer company and getting him and the Italian Rabbi together has been a challenge. Good news: The problem has finally been overcome and the COR designation should be on the product within the year.

Gary Soren, co-founder

On a personal level, Gary is married and has two children. He has been to Israel two or three times, "but not since the kids". He's ready to go back. The ice cream in Israel? Gelato Fresco is better!

WHO'S NEW in T.O.

UJA ACTIVIST PUTS SARAJEVO PAST BEHIND

Howard English

When Mair Musafija woke up one morning in March of last year to find Sarajevo split in two, he knew it was time to go. It was the start of an eight month odyssey that took Mair and his family from his city of birth to Toronto.

MAIR MUSAFIJA
at work in Toronto

A little more than a year ago, Mair was anxiously waiting in Belgrade for visas to Canada. Today, he's settled, satisfied and striving for success. He's determined, through his UJA activism, to repay the Jewish community for bringing him here.

In Sarajevo, Mair was a prominent producer of television dramas and a well read theatre critic. His career path was precisely on target. He had grasped the good life. The civil war struck and life turned full circle.

"In 1988, we were thinking about buying a car. In 1991, we were worried about having enough food for the winter", he recently recalled.

Mair remembers nine hour lineups for gas - even leaving 20 litres on his balcony - so the Musafija family could quickly escape. He didn't have to wait long.

In the spring of 1992, in the middle of the night, Serb forces overpowered Sarajevo, cutting off contact between one section of the city and the other.

"I realized I was in a trap," said Mair. "I could not see my mother. My children could not go out. There was nowhere you could buy bread. Everything was closed."

So Mair took two weeks vacation to see his mother-in-law in nearby Belgrade, briefly returned to his job in Sarajevo, convinced his editor to send him on assignment outside the city and never came back.

He, his wife and two children, with the help of Sarajevo's Jewish community, searched from Belgrade for countries of refuge.

"Canada was one of the first to respond," he told inT.O.

But Canada was slow with its paperwork, leaving the Musafijas eight months to ponder what becoming Canadian residents would be like. They poured over maps, memorized the cities that formed greater Metropolitan Toronto, and worried about being placed in Etobicoke or Mississauga.

On the flight from Belgrade, Mair assumed his family would be living with the sponsors who brought him to Canada, and wondered how there would be enough room for everyone.

Instead, thanks to UJA-funded Jewish Immigrants Aid Services, the Musafijas found themselves inside a comfortable, private apartment - a building "with a bright new lobby and all this furniture."

Now, one child later, and a fresh future ahead, Mair has not only landed a production job with Paragon Entertainment Corporation, he's re-asserting his Jewish identity.

"I am starting to be a Jew first and then whatever my profession may be."

Mair has found expression for both his Jewish roots and his gratitude at UJA.

"I gave a speech to the Young Business Network and decided that I wanted to be part of it," he explained.

"Why should I be just a refugee? I would like the community to be proud that they brought me here."

From Sarajevo to Toronto, from a city destroyed by ethnic conflict to one that is seen as a multicultural model for the world, life is like a fairy-tale for Mair Musafija - a fairy-tale for which he refuses to take credit.

"I feel," he insisted, "that God is with me."

BERNARD BETEL EDUCATES THE YOUNG ABOUT ELDER ABUSE

They are an unlikely acting troupe, performing for an unlikely audience.

The actors are all over 65. The viewers are under 20. Together they are unravelling the secrets of elder abuse.

The Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living has come up with one of Canada's most creative techniques to publicize abuse of the elderly. It's an acting company with 20 players who portray real-life situations for high school students, through originally written skits.

During one such skit presented recently at Burnamthorpe Collegiate, Reta Duenisch-Turner, 67, Fay Levy, 70, and 75 year old Evelyn Rabkin recreated the story of accountant Ted, his sister Liz, and their mother, who is being severely victimized by husband George. In order to exert all-consuming control over his wife, George has ordered her to change lawyers, stop using son Ted as the family accountant and take new medication which leaves her weak and emotionally numb.

RETA DUENISCH-TURNER
Playwright and Actress

At the end of their skit, the Betel players challenged their younger audience to not only recognize elder abuse, but to suggest solutions.

Finding answers is not simple as there are no homes for battered elderly women, and older victims are even less likely than their younger counterparts to admit, let alone report abuse.

According to Sheila Zane, who coordinates Betel's Awareness Project on Abuse of the Elderly, financial abuse is the most common form of mistreatment facing seniors. And, even more frightening, it's quite common.

That is why, says Sheila, the dramas are so important.

"They are occurrences that might happen in any family."

WORTH GETTING in T.O.

You can make a difference in this community in more ways than one.

The Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto plays a much more comprehensive role in sustaining the organized community than fundraising alone. Although everyone agrees that UJA is our top priority, our services, agencies and schools also require support in both Community Planning and Human Resource Development.

The Federation's Department for Human Resources Development (HRD) assists Federation departments, as well as our affiliate agencies and schools, in performing their jobs better by helping them recruit, interview, train, and manage the careers of volunteers at every level.

At any given time, dozens of important volunteer positions are available. Perhaps you have an interest in assisting new Canadians to integrate into society. Maybe you would like to help bring Jewish activity to hospitals, prisons and other care facilities. If you can tutor, teach, drive, translate, visit, deliver, read, coach, interview or use the phone, there is a direct service volunteer opportunity for you.

HRD also helps to place volunteers onto the boards and committees of the Federation and its affiliate agencies and schools. Below are just a few examples of specific volunteer positions available right now. If you have any questions about these or any other volunteer opportunities, or if you would like information on other aspects of Human Resource Development, please call the HRD Director, GERALD FISHER, at 631-5721. Getting involved in the community is something worth getting into!

IMMEDIATE OPENINGS:

MENTORING:
The Jewish Vocational Service requires volunteer mentors in almost every professional category. Volunteer mentors are matched to new immigrants who share their professional field. The Mentor is responsible for orienting and advising a new Canadian about how to access job information, prepare for interviews, network, etc.

PALUNTEERS:
The Reena Foundation needs people to serve as "Palunteers" to developmentally disabled adults.

Palunteers befriend Reena clients, meeting them for coffee and a chat, perhaps going to a movie together and generally ensuring that Reena clients have some social activity.

THE BAYCREST CHALLENGE:
Baycrest is preparing for the 1994 Baycrest Challenge. The "Challenge" is a warmup to the Toronto marathon, involving thousands of people

Baycrest is seeking people to serve on the Promotions and Incentives Committee as well as the Media/Publicity Committee.

CAMPUS SERVICES:
The Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto supports three active campus organizations. The Jewish Students Federation (York), Jewish Students Union (U of T), and Jewish Student Council (Ryerson/Seneca) all need volunteers to serve on a variety of committees dealing with Jewish Continuity, Long Term Planning, Fundraising and Alumni affairs.

EVENT REPORTS

NORTH YORK PERFORMING ARTS CENTRE SPECTACULAR!

The guided tour of the North York Performing Arts Centre on November 3, 1993 was a "great success", Young Construction Co-Chair Gordon Wiseman told inT.O. Hosted by the Young Construction Network of the UJA, attendees were treated to breakfast and an address by the facility's Chief Architect, Eberhard Zeidler. Mr. Zeidler provided insights into the design, as well as the process of government and private sector co-operation that enabled this striking facility to be built despite a very tight budget. Mr. Zeidler's enlightening tour and the centre itself earned unanimous praise.

Look for more interesting Young Construction Network programs in the future. Come see and hear the inside story on other major Toronto developments and much more!

UJA's Young Business Network hosted an extremely successful evening at the Hot Stove Lounge featuring Rick Aaronson (centre), speaking on sports and entertainment marketing.

TENSE CONFRONTATION BETWEEN PANELISTS AT UJA EVENT

The Young Professionals Network's first ever program began as a UJA-sponsored forum on the media's portrayal of Israel.

It ended up as a verbal boxing match between two combatants who happened to be panelists.

In one corner, Toronto Star columnist Richard Gwyn, famous for his sharp-tongued criticism in the past of Israeli policy. In the other, activist David Rotenberg, well known for his ardent defense of Israel.

They disagreed on just about everything.

Gwyn, who strongly supports Israel's accord with the PLO, asserted that "one can now write about Israel in a normal way". Rotenberg countered: "The media which now praises Israel have not changed their view of history. They see Israelis as victimizers." Gwyn defined himself as "pro-Israel", and definitely not "anti-Semitic". He also attributed anti-Semitism mostly to Christians, not Arabs.
"The Arabs have been oppressing Jews for 1,000 years", Rotenberg shot back. "Christians have done it better. I give them credit for that."

The program was moderated by TV Ontario host Steve Paikin, an experienced journalist.

The event attracted some 150 people who flooded the panelists with so many questions that the discussion continued well into the reception.

In retirement, Jack Bain has perfected his talent for turning bare blocks of wood into works of art. His carvings have won a number of Canadian awards.

For 30 years, Jack Bain carved out an impressive career as an advertising executive. Now his retirement's financial security is in the hands of TD Trust.

Woodcarving masterpiece: Prize-winning, working model of a classic carousel, includes 20 intricately-detailed animals. Jack devoted more than a year to its creation.

Most of the income for Jack and Mimi Beaubien Bain's retirement depends on the choices made by the investment management experts at TD Trust.

Both Jack and Mimi have the capacity to manage their financial affairs themselves. Jack, after all, was a WWII officer, and built a highly successful advertising career. And for years, Mimi was co-owner of a lucrative retail operation.

So why turn over the management of their assets to someone else? Simple: The Bains hired TD Trust's investment advisors because they believe them to be the best. Says Jack: "TD Trust does a lot for us... above and beyond the call of duty."

UWO apology concerns Jews

By MARA KOVEN and FRANCES KRAFT

LONDON — Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), B'nai Brith and members of the London Jewish community have expressed concern and requested clarification about a settlement reached between the University of Western Ontario (UWO) and a group of former students who alleged anti-Arab discrimination.

The students — Maysoun Abusitta, Nadia Shousher and Ken Fanni — along with then-president of the Canadian Arab Federation, James Kafieh, filed their complaint with the Ontario Human Rights Commission (OHRC) in 1987.

The university recently agreed to issue apologies in the London Free Press and in UWO campus newspapers the Gazette and Western News, and to pay $2,000 to each complainant over three incidents of "differential treatment of Arab students."

The apology letter, signed by university president George Pedersen, makes no mention of a controversial poster cited in the original complaint. The poster, which advertised a campus lecture by PLO representative Abdullah Abdullah, featured an award-winning cartoon depicting a Palestinian child with his arms in the air, surrounded by Israeli soldiers; the caption compared Zionism to apartheid.

The cartoon replicated the famous World War II photograph of a young Jewish boy surrounded by German soldiers in the Warsaw Ghetto. It was originally published in Portugal during Israel's invasion of Lebanon and was chosen by five Canadian judges from over 900 entries, representing more than 60 countries, to win the grand prize at Montreal's Salon of Cartoons in 1985.

The poster was "one of the most vile expressions of anti-Semitism that we've seen on a university campus in many years," said Bernie Farber of Canadian Jewish Congress.

University administrators reacted swiftly to complaints by members of the university's Jewish community at the time: the poster was removed, and Pedersen reprimanded Abusitta, who was then head of Canadians Concerned for the Middle East (CCME), the campus organization sponsoring Abdullah's talk, calling the lecture notice "obscene" and saying it had "no place on any Canadian university campus."

George Pedersen

Wesley Rayner, then dean of the Faculty of Law, also took exception to the drawing and was named along with Pedersen in the complaint.

The complainants argued that "provocative and inflammatory posters and lecture notices by other students organizations...had been posted on campus the same week...and yet resulted in no interference or comment by the university administration."

The two other incidents involved difficulties encountered by Shousher in reserving a room for a public event and Kafieh's concern that the university had failed to respond to Arab student complaints over disruptions of Arab student events and over anti-Arab caricatures over a 10-year period in The Gazette.

UWO professor Ted Medzon, who is vice-president of the London Jewish Federation and staff liaison to the Jewish Student Union (JSU), provided some context for the complaint. "There was a crisis occuring in the Middle East at that time. That was the beginning of the intifadah. On campus, Jewish students demonstrated and disturbed Arab discussion sometimes more than Arabs disturbed Jewish rallies. UWO did not want riots and were careful in asking questions of people's origins before booking rooms."

"While we believe that the complaint centering around the treatment of certain Arab groups on campus relating to provision of services is meritorious, clearly it would be highly improper for university officials to apologize for condemning a poster which in our opinion should be condemned as anti-Semitic," stated Gerda Frieberg, chair of CJC Ontario region.

"We are concerned that the university could reach a settlement with and apologize to a group that had produced posters that distorted and trivialized the memory of the

More charges laid

MONTREAL — A new charge of break and enter with theft has been laid against Rabbi Meyer Krentzman and Andor Galandauer.

This latest charge against the two relates to an incident alleged to have taken place Dec. 7, 1993 at a private residence on Couvrette Street in the Montreal suburb of St. Laurent.

Galandauer and Rabbi Krentzman already face seven drug-related charges each, including trafficking in cocaine and heroin; and four counts of possession of equipment to produce fake passports and other illegal documents and other illegally obtained equipment.

Galandauer is also charged with possession of prohibited arms and improper storage of firearms.

In a separate matter, Rabbi Krentzman faces two counts of fraud.

A preliminary inquiry on all charges against both men is scheduled for March 10, when a date is expected to be set either to proceed with the inquiry or go directly to trial.

Rabbi Krentzman's lawyer, Raphael Schachter, told The CJN that in the meantime, there will be "ongoing discussions" with the Crown.

Parliament adopts new opening prayer

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

OTTAWA — This week marked the adoption of a new opening prayer to be used daily in the House of Commons. The prayer, shorter than the traditional one and written in more modern language, refers to "Almighty God," expressing thanks for Canada's freedom, opportunity and peace and asking for wisdom to make good laws and decisions as Members of Parliament. The new version includes a prayer for Queen Elizabeth and the governor-general, and is followed by a moment of silence.

The former prayer, in use since 1877 and unchanged since the 1950s, asked God's blessing for the lawmakers and the Queen, and concluded with the Lord's Prayer. It contained three references to Jesus Christ.

The prayer had been the subject of complaints for years because of its exclusivity and outdated language, said MP Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands). Milliken headed the Procedures and House Affairs Committee which studied the prayer issue and recommended the changes. The new version was approved unanimously.

"I was quite pleased. I think it's high time this happened," Milliken told The CJN.

Gaston Leroux, Bloc Quebecois MP for Richmond-Wolfe and secretary-general of the Bloc Quebecois caucus, told The CJN, "The Bloc Quebecois is convinced that a prayer must be above all a personal exercise. It is also necessary that, no matter what their religion or their degree of religious observance may be, all our MPs be able to identify with the text of the prayer used."

"The traditional prayer didn't offend me, but it didn't include me, and I felt that sense of exclusion as I'm sure my colleagues of other faiths did," St. Paul's MP Barry Campbell, who is Jewish, said in a telephone interview. On a personal note, Campbell said it was very important for him personally to hear the new prayer for the first time Monday and to feel included.

Jewish art has reflected surrounding cultures

By DR. FRED WEINBERG
Special to The CJN

An illuminated Hebrew scroll of Esther from China, an object unique in both Chinese and Jewish art, forms an important part of the Judaica Museum at the Beth Tzedec Congregation. This megillah was acquired in 1947 by the late Professor Cecil Roth in London, England from a private collection. It is handwritten in the traditional manner by a scribe on seven strips of parchment of approximately 6¾ inches wide. These strips are stitched together to make a complete scroll, which is wound on a wooden roller with the first three feet backed with red Chinese silk.

The style of the Hebrew calligraphy is Sephardic, but what makes this manuscript of such exceptional interest are the illuminations which are Chinese in style, inspiration and execution. The 22nd column (as shown in the illustration), gives the names of the sons of Haman (Esther, IX.7-9) and, in the traditional manner, a large blank space was left which permitted the artist to draw a full-length figure in gold of a Chinese archer holding his bow in his right hand but drawing the bowstring behind his back with the left.

The drapery on the figure is skilfully drawn, and at the foot of the next column, a large decorated fish is depicted in gold. Other than being a symbol of good luck, the significance of this particular point is, according to Professor Roth, obscure. Other figures of Chinese children, one wearing a costume that is clearly Manchu, appear on other strips of the parchment scroll. In the margin beside the Hebrew text are gold-colored lotus flowers, dragon flies and butterflies.

For a long time, as Jews, we have denied the presence of Jewish art on the grounds of the second commandment that "You shall not make for yourself a sculptured image, or any likeness of what is in the heavens above, or on the earth below, or in the waters under the earth." Contradicting this statement however, in the biblical Book of Exodus, an artist Bezalel is described as being "endowed with a divine spirit of skill, ability and knowledge in every craft" so that even in the oldest Hebrew document, the Bible itself, there are different possible attitudes to art.

Because Jews lived in so many different environments, it was natural for them to reflect the surrounding cultures. Accordingly then, when Jews lived in Islamic countries where figural drawing was not dominant, the Jews followed suit. However, in Christian countries, Jews were involved in figural art because it was prominent in the milieu in which they lived.

The style and the subject matter of Jewish art is often adapted from the corresponding non-Jewish society; this can be seen in the illumination of Hebrew manuscripts such as Purim scrolls and Passover Haggadahs, particularly those from Italy and Germany. In European ghetto life, the megillah of Purim was often illustrated because of the lighthearted associations of this festive holiday and perhaps even the relationship (in time only) with the Roman Catholic spring carnival.

An important additional dimension was added to the issue of Jewish art with the discovery in 1932 of a small third century synagogue in the Roman provincial outpost of Dura Europos in Syria. This synagogue carries on its walls a cycle of figural paintings inspired by the Hebrew Bible. This discovery challenged many of the previously held theories about the role played by images in Judaism, and even posed the question of whether Christian art didn't have some foundation in a preceding Jewish art form.

There is no reason to think that China would be an exception to the custom of colorful illumination of the Book of Esther, since there was a very ancient Jewish community in the area of Kaifeng Fu.

We know a lot about that now extinct Chinese Jewish community because of the research of an Anglican missionary, Bishop White, sent out from Toronto to China at the turn of the century. Because of Bishop White's scholarship and the fact that his headquarters were in Kaifeng, we have a detailed description and a very large volume entitled Chinese Jews, in which he reported his findings about the Jews of China.

Bishop White found documentary evidence of the presence of a considerable number of Jewish settlers in China, as well as of earlier visits by wandering Jewish adventurers and enterprising merchants plying the ancient trade routes as early as the eighth century. At about that time, a group of some one thousand Persian or Indian Jews arrived in Kaifeng who were experts in the craft of dyeing and pattern-printing cotton fabrics. Some of these craftsmen and traders came at the invitation of the Emperor, who was anxious to develop this industry to meet the chronic silk shortage from which his country was suffering.

Archer-Executioner (Column 22) and Fish (Column 23) of the Chinese scroll of Esther from the Kaifeng Jewish Community, housed in the Museum of Beth Tzedec Congregation, Toronto.

The Kaifeng colony, the best-known and largest among a number of far flung Chinese Jewish communities, built its first synagogue more than 800 years ago in 1153. Enjoying considerable religious freedom and favored treatment, the Chinese Jews flourished and mixed freely with their neighbors. Gradually succumbing to assimilation, the community began to dwindle and disappear. During the terrible disaster of 1849, when the Yellow River overflowed its banks, hundreds of Jews lost their lives and the impoverished survivors were forced to sell the synagogue and their possessions, in order to stay alive.

As recently as the end of World War II, some 250 traceable descendants of the Jewish community still survived, but through inter-marriage they had lost their Jewish identity. It was from some of these last survivors that a number of biblical and liturgical Hebrew manuscripts were acquired.

Bishop White lived for 25 years in Kaifeng which was the home of the Jewish colony and became very close and friendly with the remaining living members of the Jewish community. He found stone inscriptions of the synagogue that remained, some Hebrew writings and many artifacts related to that Jewish community. Some of these are now housed in the Royal Ontario Museum of Toronto and museums in England.

The Chinese Jews, according to Prof. Cecil Roth and other historians, greatly respected the memory of Queen Esther, and there are early 18th century accounts of this. One of these suggests that "the Jews of China have for this Princess, the most profound veneration. They call her always Issetha Mama, the great mother. Their reverence extends also to Mordechai, whom they call Moto-Kal. They regard them as the saviors of Israel." This is from a 1781 memoir.

It is not then far-fetched to allocate this particular megillah as coming from the Chinese Jewish community in Kaifeng. There is additional information about the importance of the Feast of Purim in Kaifeng and it is known that to celebrate this holiday properly it was obligatory to recite the Book of Esther from a traditionally written scroll.

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The hate crimes division of the Metropolitan Toronto Police Force last week reported that 155 incidents "motivated by hate" occurred in Metro Toronto in 1993. Arrests were made in 31 cases.

The greatest number of the offences, 77, were racially-motivated, while 54 were attributable to religious bias. Of the 54 offences against religious groups, 48 were directed at "Semitic," or Jewish targets, the report stated.

In a breakdown of incidents by location, the report found that 19 incidents targetting religious groups occurred in 32 Division, an area of North York bounded by Dufferin and Bayview, Steeles and Lawrence. During Passover last year, the Clanton Park Synagogue was painted with anti-Semitic graffiti, as were other buildings nearby. No arrests were made, said Det. Sgt. Wayne Cotgreave, head of the hate crimes unit. Similar incidents have occurred in the area around Earl Bales Park, he added.

Of the 31 arrests for hate incidents that were recorded in 1993, 26 were for assaults, one was for publishing hate propaganda (that case, involving Elisse Hategan, formerly of the white supremacist Heritage Front, is still before the courts), three were for mischief and one was in connection with a bomb threat.

Cotgreave said the report was compiled by "counting the occurrences that came in from field officers." He said police have been trained to recognize and identify incidents that may be motivated by hate and to report them to the unit.

Cotgreave said he believed the report was "fairly accurate" considering it was the first year Metro police have compiled such data.

Following a request in December 1992 by Deputy Chief David Boothby, the Metropolitan Toronto Police Services Board gave police the green light to gather statistics on groups targetted for hate crimes. The hate crimes unit, which went into operation on Jan. 1, 1993 as a subdivision of the intelligence section, was mandated to collect the data and to investigate incidents that were motivated by hate.

Cotgreave said the only other Canadian hate crimes unit collecting similar data is in Ottawa, where 176 incidents were reported.

Asked to explain the higher number of hate crimes in Ottawa, which is much smaller in population than Toronto, Cotgreave said that perhaps "Toronto has less hate. I don't know. This is new for everybody. I think that our population because of [their] cultures may not feel they can trust the police to report things."

He said another factor could be that not all police in Toronto are sufficiently sensitized to recognized incidents motivated by hate.

Bernie Farber, director of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress, said, "The total numbers of hate crimes cannot be seen as anything other than a touchstone. You cannot reach any conclusion with regard to the enormity of the problem."

He said it is unclear from the report how the data were gathered and what definition was employed to determine whether hate was a motivating factor in an incident.

He was also critical of police for failing to discuss their data with the communities involved to see if it jibes with that of the targetted groups.

Farber pointed out that the report cites only three incidents of hate propaganda directed at groups defined by religion. But Congress alone reported four such incidents to police in 1993, he said.

Cotgreave said "I'm not in a position yet to explain the discrepancy. It could be we're out one or two or it may not have been considered a hate propaganda offence."

He said the unit was new to the task and perhaps had not ironed out all the bugs that come with a new assignment.

Farber was also critical of the designation "Semitic" to describe Jews as a targetted group. He suggested that this points to a lack of sophistication in the unit.

Holocaust," said Alain Goldschlager, a UWO professor and London representative for B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights. "Those posters poisoned the environment for many in the university and wider Jewish community."

London Jews have asked for clarification on Pedersen's apology, which stated in part that "there have been situations where there has been differential treatment." He apologized "for the treatment of and any hurt caused to the students and other members of the Arab/Palestinian community."

"Is [Pedersen] saying that it's now okay to use that poster?" asks Jay Papernick, chair of the Coalition of Western Jewish Students, an organization of the JSU.

"There are two separate issues here," says Gerry Enchin, director of the London Jewish Federation." "The Jewish community fully supports the rights of all students not to be discriminated against, but we have a concern about President Pedersen implying that the apology covers something that was clearly anti-Semitic."

Pederson, who met recently with Medzon, Goldschlager and two other university staffers to discuss the issue, told The CJN he has not changed his initial opinion of the poster. "I still have strong personal feelings about those posters, but that is not what is at issue here. Any student has the right to complain about feeling discriminated against. This won't open [the door] any wider for any other ethnic group to come forward against the university."

Pedersen, whose tenure as president ends this year, stated that the timing of the agreement reflected an effort to get the issue resolved so that it wouldn't be left to the incoming president.

Laith Al-Soufi, president of CCME, said it is understandable why the poster would be distasteful to Jews. "As long as I'm here, this will be a thing of the past, and we will not use that poster. Most members of CCME are in support of the peace process and would rather work towards co-operation with other Jews."

Both Papernick and Al-Soufi stated that Arab-Jewish student relationships on campus are very good and open.

Canada-Israel Committee defends non-partisan role in Quebec

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Jewish leaders affirm that there has been no shift in the community's traditional non-partisan approach to politics.

A front-page article in Le Devoir last week bore the headline "The Jewish lobby gets closer to the PQ (Parti Quebecois)." It left the impression in some readers' minds that, because a PQ victory seems inevitable in this year's provincial election, the organized Jewish community has been developing closer links with Quebec sovereigntists, and that this was a clear contrast to its nervousness about nationalism in the past.

The story was based on an "internal document" of the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC), which discussed the trip to Israel by nine prominent francophone Quebecers last April, sponsored by the Jewish community.

It is also noted that CIC Quebec chair Thomas Hecht, who led that trip, has agreed to serve on the honorary committee planning Quebec's Fete Nationale June 24.

Neither development is secret or new. Both the Israel trip and Hecht's acceptance of the committee appointment were reported in The CJN last year.

Among the participants in the Israel trip were leading advocates of Quebec independence, including Sylvain Simard, president of the Mouvement National des Quebecois, which organizes the Fete Nationale celebration, and former PQ leader and premier Pierre Marc Johnson, as well as federalists such as Montreal mayoralty candidate Claude Beauchamp and Ghislain Dufour, director of the largest employers' group in Quebec.

The article in Le Devoir quotes Hecht as saying in an interview that sovereignty is "a legitimate option," but that the great majority of Quebec Jews remain federalists.

He is also said to have stressed that the four organizations the CIC represents (but actually is sponsored by), Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), Canadian Zionist Federation, B'nai Brith Canada (BBC) and the Communaute Sepharade du Quebec (CSQ), as well as that "all Jewish community leaders," support rapprochement with Quebec nationalists.

Michael Crelinsten, executive director of CJC Quebec region, said nothing has changed in the community's policy or approach. CJC has been engaged in dialogue with French-Quebecers (including nationalists) for many years. (Jean Dorion, president of the St. Jean Baptiste Society, was a guest speaker at the CJC Plenary Assembly in 1989.)

But he makes a distinction between this contact and that with the PQ, which is of many years' standing. "Our engagement with the PQ is not one of rapprochement but of political dialogue, which we carry on with parties across the spectrum."

He sees that as only normal for an organization that speaks for the Jewish community and must keep informed of political developments. "It should be self-evident that it is in the community's interest to maintain contact with both the government and the opposition," he said.

He stressed that CJC does not regard it as a foregone conclusion that the PQ will win the election. "There's still a long way to go."

Although the CIC's mandate is to explain Israel to the public, and not to speak for the community on local political matters, Crelinsten said he does not believe Hecht has overstepped the boundaries.

"Ideally, the spokespersons for each organization should confine themselves to their mandates, but it is recognized that, at times, there has to be flexibility. It is not always possible to demur from answering questions [from the media]," he said.

Crelinsten noted that Hecht is also a member of an inter-organizational committee that engages in bilateral relations with the PQ on behalf of the Jewish community. Representatives of CJC, CIC (Quebec), the CSQ and Federation CJA sit on that body.

Hecht could not be reached for comment by The CJN.

Steven Drysadale, executive vice-president of Federation CJA, echoed similar views to those of Crelinstein. "Our meetings with the PQ go back to the time when they were first in power (1976-81). We maintain relations with all parties in the province."

An "evolution" may have taken place over the years in the sense that community representatives are more comfortable in French and may be more involved in provincial politics.

"If there has been a change in attitude it is that we intend to stay and not pack up and leave if the PQ is elected," Drysdale said.

As for the CIC inviting influential Quebecers to Israel, Drysdale observed that this is what the CIC has been doing elsewhere in Canada for many years.

Yechiel Glustein, regional BBC executive director, said his organization's policy is to foster good relations with all provincial and national parties, while remaining non-partisan.

While the CIC's mandate is to promote understanding of Israel, Glustein is convinced that any remarks Hécht makes about Quebec politics are motivated by an "interest in the welfare of the Jewish community."

Ottawa adopts new prayer

"I'm very pleased with the change. I think it means the House in its procedures is reflective of the reality of Canada," said Campbell. "It's not going to please everyone, but I don't think it can be said to exclude anyone. That's very important."

Campbell pointed out that, contrary to tradition, Monday's prayer was said publicly "so that people could hear it." The prayer has always been recited before the public was admitted to the House.

Frank Dimant, executive vice-president of B'nai Brith Canada, expressed his praise for Milliken and his committee following adoption of the new prayer. Dimant and Gabriel Nachman, BBC president, had written to Gilbert Parent, Speaker of the House, last week, asking Parliament to consider changing the prayer to reflect Canada's multiculturalism.

David Berger, Saint-Henri-Westmount MP, said he believes it is appropriate to change the prayer given the multicultural make-up of Canada and Parliament itself.

• • •

Provincial and territorial governments across the country, with the exception of Newfoundland and Quebec, open their sessions with prayers, some Christian-oriented and others more general. The Quebec National Assembly observes a moment of silence.

British Columbia's Legislative Assembly appears to be the only provincial legislature which has ever had a Jewish prayer. They use a series of general prayers, and have had additional prayers offered on a rotating basis by members and clergy of different faiths, including Jewish, Sikh and Native Indian. Opening day prayers were once said by a rabbi, The CJN was told.

The Senate prayer, which was under consideration for the House of Commons, is a brief prayer addressed to "Almighty God" and similar in content to the new House of Commons prayer.

U.S. black radical speaks in Winnipeg

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — American black radical Kwame Ture was one of the speakers invited to address the University of Manitoba's annual Celebration of Life and Learning recently.

According to Victor Vrsnik, program co-ordinator for the festival, the 1950s American student activist (then known as Stokely Carmichael) was invited to reflect on the student movement, its past and future. Vrsnik says he was aware of Ture's involvement in the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) and the Black Panthers (of which he was "prime minister"), but he was not familiar with his anti-Zionism.

"He generated a lot of interest among our student population," Vrsnik says. "As many as 900 people heard him."

Ture's career is described in detail in a background paper made available by the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada's Midwest region, which was sent to the festival organizing committee. According to the report, Carmichael moved to Africa in 1969, where he worked for Kwame Nkrumah in Ghana and Sekou Ture in Guinea, both dictators, and adopoted their names as his own in the early 1980s. He returned to the United States in the mid-1980s and became leader of the Washington-based All-African People's Revolutionary Party, an anti-Semitic radical group on the fringe of the American left. He tours college campuses making anti-Zionist, anti-American and racist speeches. Although his following is very limited, in some cases, his speeches have been followed by attacks against Jewish students on American campuses where he has spoken.

Michael Lazar, chair of the League for Human Rights Midwest region, reports that Ture did seem to make an effort at the University of Manitoba to separate his anti-Zionism from anti-Semitism. "His statements this time were not as anti-Semitic as in previous speeches," Lazar says. "Most of the time though, there is no difference between anti-Zionism and anti-Semitism."

Lazar was not only critical of what Ture said but also of the speech as a whole. "In general, he is a bad speaker," Lazar says.

During the question and answer period, Lazar notes, a non-Jewish member of the audience praised Ture for his socialist values but asked him why he didn't join other Black leaders in condemning Dr. Louis Farrakhan and the recent incident involving one of his lieutenants who was roundly condemned for a blatantly racist speech. His response was that Farrakhan has a large following.

Ture also accused B'nai Brith of having spied on him since he was five years old and challenged the organization to a debate any time and anywhere.

Vrsnik describes Ture as a "dynamic speaker, resolute in what he says and unafraid to say it." He heard Ture's speech to the African Students Association but admits he missed most of his main presentation.

Although he says some students raised concerns about Ture's anti-Zionist comments, Vrsnik says he would invite the Black radical again if he were to do it over. "We don't censor anyone's comments," he says.

Christian family gets reprieve

MONTREAL — Immigration Minister Sergio Marchi has granted a reprieve to the Christian family from the former Soviet Union who were facing deportation to Israel.

Richard St. Louis, a spokesman for the immigration department, said Marchi has issued a minister's permit to enable the Davidovs to apply to immigrate to Canada from outside the country and then remain here while their case is processed.

This means the family, which consists of Olga and Valery Davidov and their two sons aged 21 and 13, may go, for example, to the Canadian Consulate in Buffalo, N.Y., and then return to their home in Ste. Foy, in suburban Quebec City, until a decision is made on their case.

Olga Davidov, 42, works as an interpreter for the Russian players on the Quebec Nordiques hockey team and the family's plight has become a cause celebre in the Old Capital. Eight thousand names were collected on a petition asking that Canada allow the family to remain.

The Davidovs left their home in Tajikistan, an autonomous republic in central Asia, for Israel in late 1990 on the strength of false papers identifying Olga as Jewish by maternal descent.

Never intended to stay in Israel

Israel, it seems, was the quickest route out of Tajikistan, where Islamic fundamentalists are vying for control. The Davidovs have made it clear to the media here that they never intended to stay in Israel and were unhappy while they were there.

They came to Canada in February, 1992 as visitors and quickly claimed refugee status, which they were denied. In December, Federal Court refused to hear an appeal of the refugee board decision.

The Davidovs then asked to be allowed to apply to immigrate to Canada on humanitarian grounds, but were turned down by the immigration department.

In early February, they were served with a "conditional departure notice," requiring them to leave the country within 30 days, or be expelled.

While high-profile, the Davidov case is not unique. By the end of September, 1,653 persons coming from Israel claimed refugee status in Canada in 1993 — and most are originally from the former Soviet Union.

During that nine-month period, 116 were granted refugee status, 392 were denied it, and 226 abandoned their claims. Year-end statistics are due this month.

Pamplet denying Holocaust surfaces

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — The University of British Columbia (UBC) has been flooded with copies of the Ball Report, produced by John Ball and published by Samisdat Publishers Ltd. of Toronto

Samisdat also publishes Holocaust on Trial — the Case of Ernst Zundel and material by Fred Leuchter denying the existence of gas chambers at Auschwitz, Birkenau and Majdanek concentration camps. These publications are offered for a "minimum suggested donation " on the last page of the Ball Report.

The 16-page report consists of maps "drawn from World War II air photos" by Ball and his interpretation of those maps. Among his conclusions are:

- "it is unlikely even one [person] was gassed" at Birkenau;
- "Belzec alleged murder camp appears to have been a logging camp from 1940 to '44";
- the massacre of more than 30,000 Jews at Babi Yar, Ukraine in September 1941, and subsequent killings and mass burials of 70,000 more at the site are "dismissed as wartime propaganda."

Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), Pacific region director Erwin Nest recently received a copy of a letter to a UBC official from Christopher Friedrichs, associate professor of history at UBC, in which he states that Ball was "methodically placing a brochure on each desk" in his classroom. In his letter, Friedrichs describes the brochure as "a typical product of the Holocaust-denial movement, attempting to 'prove' that there were no gas chambers at Auschwitz, etc.

"When I asked him what he was doing," the letter continues, "he said that he had been speaking to a student in my class and had decided it would be useful for my students to have this material. I told him firmly that I as instructor decide what will be distributed to students in my history courses and that this material was not wanted and that he should gather up the brochures and leave. He promptly did so."

The professor said he was disturbed by what happened "because it was clear that by leaving the brochure on each desk, Ball was trying to create the illusion that this was an authorized course handout."

The Ubyssey, the university newspaper, headlined the story on page one of its Feb. 8 issue and reported further that over 1,700 copies of the report had been placed on car windshields across the campus. About 90 per cent of them had been taken off the cars by students from Hillel House.

A story about the incident in the community newspaper, the Kitsilano News [Feb. 9], says John Ball was the Richmond East Social Credit candidate in the 1991 provincial election but had to resign his candidacy after his connections to Zundel were revealed in the Vancouver Sun..

The UBC RCMP detachment said the publication has been referred to the regional Crown counsel for evaluation. The head of the detachment, Bern Jansen, said the brochure appeared to be carefully written to avoid possible charges.

Attempts by The CJN to contact Ball were unsuccessful.

BB guide takes aim at anti-Semitism

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Jewish students are advised to regard "JAP" jokes as a form of anti-Semitism that must be countered, in a guide published by the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada (BBC).

"Racist stereotyping, even in the guise of humor, should always be challenged. If you laugh off a sexist or racist slur directed against Jews or any other group, you become an accomplice to racism," it is stated in the just-released Anti-Semitism on Campus: A Handbook for Student Action.

Jokes about the Jewish American Princess are a double whammy because they combine "the worst elements of sexism and anti-Semitism." Any "Jewish joke," even if it is told by a Jew, should be denounced because it is likely based on the stereotype of Jews as greedy, pushy or clannish, it says.

The handbook also says one of the most common forms of anti-Semitism at universities is "anti-Jewish stereotypes and misconceptions" among students.

The bilingual handbook was written by a team of students and researchers employed by the League. Copies are being mailed to Jewish student unions and B'nai Brith Hillel offices at Canadian campuses and to all university presidents.

The handbook also deals with hate propaganda, Holocaust denial, racist graffiti, anti-Semitic material in libraries and anti-Zionism. Instructions are given on what to do about anti-Semitic speakers, faculty, campus press articles and hate groups.

The more subtle issue of "inclusiveness" is also addressed.

Anti-Semitic classics like Mein Kampf and more recent Holocaust denial works have a legitimate place in university libraries as primary sources on anti-Semitism, for example, but they should not be filed under history or other disciplines that lend them credence, the handbook says.

Holocaust deniers speaking at campuses should be regarded as hate propagandists, it says elsewhere.

Defining the line between anti-Zionism and anti-Semitism is more difficult, the League acknowledges, but certain expressions used in criticism of Israel may indicate racist motive.

According to the League, these include conspiracy theories and comparison of Israeli policies or Zionism to Nazism. "Be wary of extremely vitriolic attacks on Israel which seem to lack balance, depart from objective standards and demonize Israel."

When anti-Semitic speakers are invited, Jewish students should, above all, protest if their honorarium is coming out of student fees, directly or indirectly. They should make it publicly known, through the campus newspaper, for example, why they object to a speaker's presence. In "extreme cases," a peaceful demonstration against the speaker should be considered.

"Concerns about free speech have their place, but you also have the right to go to school without having to be the target of anti-Semitism," the handbook states.

If the problem is with a professor's views or insensitivity, the League urges students to speak up, privately and calmly. When that doesn't work, the student should go to the department head or all the way to the dean, if necessary.

"Silence solves nothing," the handbook concludes.

These guidelines are also applied when seeking respect for Jewish concerns, such as avoiding exams on holidays or obtaining kosher food in the cafeteria.

Beit HaLochem centre serves Israeli veterans

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

They are paraplegics, Israeli war veterans confined to wheelchairs.

This class is one of nearly a hundred activities offered at Beit HaLochem, a unique sports, cultural and social centre serving many of Israel's 40,000 disabled war veterans.

"A veteran who has to remove his prosthesis to go for a swim won't feel comfortable at the local country club. He doesn't want to feel different than everyone else," says Yoske Luttenberg, director of the Beit HaLochem branch in Tel Aviv. "We provide a solution for him."

At Beit HaLochem, disabled soldiers get much-needed physiotherapy, participate in a wide range of sports activities, and choose from first-rate adult education courses. There are also movies, art exhibits, and other cultural events, as well as a restaurant and billiard hall. All activities are voluntary and are open to veterans and their families.

Director Luttenberg is a disabled war veteran. He was wounded in 1948, and has undergone eight operations since then. He says it is important to involve family members.

"Since the family plays such an important role in rehabilitation we make sure to include them," he says.

Visitors see amazing sights at Beit HaLochem. Men without legs dive gracefully into the swimming pool. Wheelchairs whiz back and forth on the basketball court in fast-paced, aggressive games. The blind compete at goal ball. And the paraplegics dance.

"I never dreamed it would be possible to dance after my injury," says Albert Mitrani, who has been confined to a wheelchair since a training accident in Sinai in 1972. "But when I heard that Beit HaLochem was opening an Israeli folkdancing course for paraplegics, I decided to give it a try. It turned out that it really is possible."

Mitrani is a regular at the weekly dance course attended by some 25 couples. One partner in each pair — usually, the man — is paraplegic.

"The students learn a new choreography every lesson," says instructor Orly Ba'Or. "I try to keep the steps as close as possible to the original folkdance, but I add more hand movements for the men, and the women do steps around their partners' wheelchairs."

The dances are performed with surprising energy and flare. The result is not only aesthetic, but somewhat awe-inspiring.

"You have to be really healthy psychologically and spiritually to dare to dance in a wheelchair," admits Ba'Or.

Sammy Dahan, a charismatic man in his 30s, swivels his wheelchair around with ease, gracefully moving his muscular arms and torso. His disability does not cramp his style. "Dancing comes from the soul," he says. "I love any kind of dancing — ballroom, disco, you name it. And," he adds, "I have a lot of mobility. I can do anything from my waist up."

Ba'Or says the course gives paraplegics the confidence to dance in public. "At weddings and bar mitzvahs they are the first on the dance floor. It's become natural. They feel that dance belongs to them."

A few of the men bring their wives to the course. But the majority dance with a volunteer.

"Dancing with someone in a wheelchair is very strenuous. Not every wife has the energy or ability," says Ba'Or.

But there is no shortage of volunteer women. On the contrary, there is a waiting list.

The atmosphere in the dance class, as in Beit HaLochem on the whole, is light-hearted. There is nothing at Beit HaLochem reminiscent of a hospital or veterans' home, despite the abundance of wheelchairs and prostheses.

"We worked hard to build a healthy, optimistic environment," says Luttenberg, who helped establish Beit HaLochem nearly 20 years ago. "It took people a while to get used to wearing sports clothes and running shoes in the gym. Some of them argued that they couldn't tie shoelaces. So I demanded they bring a note from their doctor. It didn't take long until everyone began wearing proper attire. It was a small step, but an important one in taking care of this place and in taking care of themselves."

The Beit HaLochem staff of over 100 includes physiotherapists, physical education instructors, sports coaches and teachers of specialized subjects ranging from history to painting. But there are no psychologists or social workers. "We don't want it to resemble an 'institution' in any way," says Luttenberg. "This is a centre for healthy people who happen to be disabled."

The vast majority of disabled veterans do go on to lead normal lives, he says. Most marry, have children, and work for a living. He runs off a list of disabled veterans in every sector of Israeli society: Members of Knesset, police chiefs, artists, musicians, writers, engineers, scientists.

There are also a number of accomplished athletes, as demonstrated by the collection of sporting trophies on display at Beit HaLochem.

"A disability doesn't change your personality," says Luttenberg. "It just sharpens it. If you had a positive outlook before, you'll have a positive outlook after your injury."

Unfortunately, the number of disabled veterans in Israel continues to swell. A tour of Beit HaLochem is like a painful trek through Israeli history.

"The veterans of the War of Independence are now reaching retirement age," says Luttenberg. "You see them here almost every morning now that they have leisure time. We have had to start new activities to accommodate a whole generation of disabled pensioners."

At the other end of the spectrum are the youngest veterans, many of them victims of intifada violence. Danny Cohen, 25, is one of them. He was paralyzed from the waist down after a 30 kilogram cement block was hurled at his head during a patrol in Nablus. "I'm lucky," he maintains. "The same thing happened to another soldier a week later and he was killed."

In between the veterans of the War of Independence and the victims of the intifada are living reminders of every other war — the Sinai Campaign, the Six-Day War, the War of Attrition, the Yom Kippur War, the Lebanon War.

"After the war in Lebanon, we couldn't accommodate the huge influx of injured soldiers," Luttenberg says sadly. "We were forced to limit our membership to only the more severely disabled veterans."

When the Tel Aviv branch of Beit HaLochem was built in 1974, it was designed to serve 2,500 disabled veterans and their families. Today it accommodates more than double that number. "We have expanded as much as we can," says Luttenberg. The latest renovation — the covering of the centre's outdoor Olympic pool — is being financed by Canadian supporters of Beit HaLochem. "It will enable the pool to be used all year round," he says with satisfaction.

Another 2,600 veterans are members of Beit HaLochem in Haifa. The newest centre, now under construction in Jerusalem, will meet the needs of an additional 5,000 veterans and their families. It is due to open in June 1994 in the Malha neighborhood of the capital. Canadian donations will pay for all the equipment in the new centre, including physiotherapy and sports facilities, computers and furniture.

All Beit HaLochem centres serve the same purpose, says Luttenberg. "We prevent problems by providing veterans with a place where they feel at home."

Hamas kills pregnant Israeli woman

Israpet

TEL AVIV — Tzippora Sasson, a 33-year-old mother of two from Ariel in the West Bank, was killed last Friday when Hamas terrorists ambushed the car in which she was a passenger just a few kilometres from her home.

She was in her fifth month of pregnancy. Her husband Ronny and her two daughters, who were in the car with her, escaped uninjured.

The family were returning from dinner with Ronny Sasson's mother in Petah Tikvah.

As news of the murder spread, residents of Ariel and nearby settlements blocked roads and demonstrated against the government and its conduct of the peace process. Several protesters were arrested at Morasha junction.

Hundreds of mourners attended Sasson's funeral in Ashkelon, some chanting "Death to Arabs." Authorities detoured vehicles bearing the licence plates issued to Arab residents of the territories away from the city.

But the government rejected sealing off the territories, as a senior official had suggested on Saturday. Foreign Minister Shimon Peres said that, although terrorist attacks harmed people's confidence in the peace process, there was no alternative but to continue with it.

Environment Minister Yossi Sarid had a blunt warning for PLO chairman Yasser Arafat. "I hope very much that Arafat understands this well — that if he and his people do not bring down the level of terrorism, terrorism will bring them down," Sarid said.

Sasson is the 23rd Israeli to die at the hands of terrorists since the peace accord was signed last September. Yuval Golan, 35, from Moshav Zitan near Lod, who was stabbed in a terror attack last December, died yesterday from his wounds at the Soroka Hospital in Beersheba.

CJN Exclusive Judy Mandleman

Judy Mandleman, recently elected national president of Canadian Hadassah-WIZO, is something of a rarity in the Vancouver Jewish community, where many of the Jews come from "somewhere else." She was born here and grew up in Vancouver and from an early age was involved in Zionist groups. "Vancouver has always had a strong Zionist community."

Mandleman has been a member of Hadassah-WIZO for over 36 years and has held a variety of positions on the national executive.

Married, with two sons, she lives in a condominium near downtown Vancouver overlooking the mountains and the sea. She jogs as often as possible at nearby Kitsilano Beach but is somewhat concerned her responsibilities as national president may curtail this activity, because she'll be travelling a lot.

Before taking on the presidency, she served as executive director of the Canadian Zionist Federation (CZF) Pacific region for nine years and is on the board of the CZF.

Although Vancouver has a Federation to handle fundraising for the community's various agencies and Jewish schools, Hadassah-WIZO is "totally separate," says Mandleman and had always done its own fundraising, directing the funds for its many Israel projects through the World Zionist Organization (WZO).

She was interviewed in Vancouver just a couple of days after she returning from an Israeli conference of the Women's International Zionist Organization (WIZO), by Maurice Lucow, The CJN's Western correspondent.

CJN: Did you learn anything new about the peace process at the WIZO meeting?

Mandleman: There were 28 countries represented at the WIZO plenary, including women from Argentina, Chile, from Europe, Eastern Europe — the Czech Republic and Hungary — as well as France, Great Britain, Italy and the United States, and of course myself, from Canada. So it was a really interesting gathering.

Yes, we heard about the peace process from three speakers: Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu; Yossi Beilin, Israel's deputy foreign minister; and from the Egyptian ambassador to Israel.

Beilin is the architect of the Declaration of Principles, the agreement signed by Rabin and Arafat, and he said the road to peace is there. "It's a fact, it's going to happen," he told us. He said that to those who ask him how can you do this and how can you do that, he has one answer: What's the alternative? He said Israel can't continue as a pariah state. The economy is booming and the country has become a member of the world states. Israel can't go in another way.

One of the most moving things Beilin told us was that when he was a kid growing up in Israel, he served 2½ years in the army and went to school six days a week. Today kids serve three years and go to school only five days a week, because the education budget has been cut to provide sufficient funds for the army. Beilin said he doesn't want his children punished because they have to continue building the military infrastructure, and he said it's morally bankrupting the country to be fighting wars all the time.

We asked Beilin what would happen to the settlements if Israel gives back the territories. His reply was that Labor started the settlements in the West Bank, not Likud, and built them in an area around Jerusalem. As far as he's concerned, those settlements will always be part of Israel. The other settlements built under the Likud should never have been built, in his opinion, but should not be destroyed as Yamit (in the Sinai) was. He said Jews and Arabs can live under the sovreignty of Israel and there's no reason that a person can't live under the sovreignty of another state and still be Jewish.

All in all, Beilin was very optimistic and said there's no turning back from the peace process.

Netanyahu is, of course, against the present peace process. He told us he's not against peace but he feels that the only road to peace is through the autonomy plan agreed on at Camp David. He said his biggest objection about the current negotiations was that although Arafat had agreed in principle to the recognition of Israel, he has not abrogated the PLO covenant and, in effect, the PLO still carry on their backs the destruction of the State of Israel. Arafat is talking nonsense, said Netanyahu, when he says he'll have problems with the Palestinians if he abrogates the covenant. If he's going to have such problems, he should have them now, before the peace deal is completed.

The Egyptian ambassador was very optimistic. I don't know where he gets his optimism but he said the peace accord with Arafat is definitely a step in the right direction and peace will happen.

The ambassador told us there has been an improvement in relations between Egypt and Israel and said if we had gone down the streets to the Dan Hotel we would have found a number of Egyptian businessmen there to arrange deals with Israelis.

One of the ladies asked him how come there are no tourists from Egypt in Israel and never have been. He said Egyptians don't travel anywhere — it's not only Israel. It was an interesting comment and wasn't one that I was aware of, but when I think about it, I don't see any Egyptians around, so I don't know.

CJN: In a Jerusalem Post interview you were quoted as saying it's a challenge for Hadassah-WIZO to adjust to the changing realities of the woman of the '90s. What are some of your plans to accommodate the ones who work?

Mandleman: There are a few ideas. First of all, we can no longer expect all women to be full-time volunteers, becuse so many are working full time. Today's reality is that the cost of living and cost of housing in major centres like Vancouver and Toronto often makes it necessary for the women to work. They require a second income. Education for their children is very expensive, so there's a different reality out there. Also, women feel that if they've gone to university and graduated as doctors, lawyers, accountants or whatever else, why shouldn't they practise their professions?

Of course they should first of all have a reason to belong to Hadassah-WIZO and I think that reason, still, is Zionism, and the connection to Israel as being central to the Jewish people. There is also the concern we all have about assimilation. One of the main things we can do to ensure our children stay within the family of the Jewish community is to get them to visit Israel, whether it's for a six- or eight-week summer program or to spend a year at a university. Many of the younger working women who have been to Israel have become committed Zionists so they want to belong to a Zionist organization and we have to find a way to accommodate them.

On a national level, I plan to encourage women to come on the national executive by keeping our officers' meetings shorter. We used to start on a Sunday morning and continue until Tuesday afternoon. I'm now going to recommend we conclude on Monday, and make meetings strictly a workshop and very business-like. I'm considering also to cut the length of our next national convention by a day.

We have to look also at job sharing. Perhaps we may no longer be able to have a single president — we may need a co-president, so that women can share responsibilities. We'll have to find ways.

CJN: Will you have to cut down on your fundraising?

Mandleman: No, because our fundraising is done at the local level. Certainly national gives members the inspiration, and funds come in through the national office. But shorter meetings doesn't mean less fundraising.

CJN: With so many women working, will they have time to work for Hadassah?

Mandleman: I've just been looking at the fundraising statistics from across the country and they're very intertesting. It's the centres that have events like bazaars or Chocolate Sundays, where many women are involved, that are our most successful centres. These are the centres that are producing and are viable. In the centres where women just write cheques — by that I mean they do strictly fundraising — they're not as vibrant and maybe not as enthusiastic. Most of our members want to be involved. What's the point of belonging to an organization if you're not involved with it?

Mandleman: Yes, so I've heard. There's a prime example. I was involved with the beginning of the second chapter in Victoria, Today's Woman. The members, who were a younger group from the long-established Victoria chapter, wanted it to be strictly a public affairs chapter. They wanted to be able to react to adverse things about Israel and to be knowledgeable about Israel. But they didn't want to fundraise. Well, today they're the movers and shakers behind the Chocolate Sunday.

The chapter this year won our membership prize for increasing membership by over 34 per cent. This was due to Chocolate Sunday because the women are all involved and because it's a hands-on thing. It doesn't take away from public affairs or from the fact that they want to be a study group. Also, the involvement of Chocolate Sunday has put Victoria Hadassah-WIZO on the map in the city and has given women a focus in coming together and being involved.

CJN: You mentioned recently that volunteerism is no longer a full-time job — that it can't be. Will you have to pay people for work normally done by volunteers?

Mandleman: Absolutely not. In fact the strength of Hadassah-WIZO is that we really are a volunteer organization, and by that I mean that other organizations have paid directors in most of their centres. As you know, we have exactly one paid director, our national executive vice-president, in Montreal. We have offices in smaller centres but they're staffed mostly by secretarial people.

CJN: You have talked about expanding your public affairs department to attract younger women. What do you classify as public affairs?

Mandleman: Public affairs has been a priority for years but because we had to put so much effort into fundraising, public affairs has in a sense been short-changed. Public affairs means hasbarah, not just for Israel but also by making our women aware of issues relevant to being Jewish, such as anti-Semitism, Holocaust denial and all of these things that are going on.

I was public affairs chair for Hadassah-WIZO when Naomi Frankenburg was president and that was the last time we had a public affairs seminar — in Brantford, Ont. It was very successful and I want to re-establish that idea. We hope women who attend such seminars will take back the information to their own communities.

CJN: Are the younger elements really interested in these issues?

Mandleman: Definitely. It's a whole new generation who don't remember how the State of Israel began and don't know much about the Holocaust. Certainly the schools don't teach much about the Holocaust. Many of the textbooks I've seen cover World War II but the Holocaust isn't even mentioned. There are a lot of holes in the education system. So we have to keep our younger members informed.

CJN: Will you have to scale back any of your projects in Israel because of the financial problems here?

Mandleman: We won't scale back but at this time we can't afford to open any more day-care centres in Israel. Times are tough for many people and we can't expect to increase our fundraising significantly. Yet we have to increase just to keep up because our dollar is devalued and our projects are funded in American dollars. So our Canadian dollar is only worth 75 cents which means we have to increase funding by 25 per cent just to keep up with the devaluation. It would be nice for a new president to say "Gee, let's open another day-care centre in Ashkelon." But that's not realistic at this time.

Mandleman: Right. The maintenance bills alone of our projects are high and we have to keep them up. One of our schools won a prize as being the best in Israel. So our projects are very important and must be maintained.

Shas to rejoin government

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — The fervently Orthodox Sephardi Shas Party announced plans last week to rejoin Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin's government after Passover.

Shas leader Aryeh Deri said his party's return, after a five-month absence, was made possible by the government's decision to support the present ban on importing non-kosher meat, even after the industry is privatized.

A bill amending a quasi-constitutional law protecting occupational freedom easily passed its initial Knesset vote on Feb. 15 by a vote of 82-11, after the Labor Party threw its support behind it.

Labor's left-wing coalition partner, Meretz, strongly opposed the bill. It was supported by all the religious parties and many traditional or observant members of the Likud opposition.

Deri said the peace process was also a factor in Shas' decision to move slowly back into the coalition fold.

He said his party would rejoin the government after the Knesset's Passover recess "if nothing untoward happens in the peace talks till then."

But observers here expect many ups and downs and more political manoeuvering before Shas actually rejoins the government, if indeed it ever does.

Deri himself is barred from resuming his former position as interior minister, since he is currently facing criminal charges relating to bribery and abuse of his office.

Another Shas Knesset member, Raphael Pinhasi, is also banned from regaining his former post as deputy religious affairs minister because he is also under indictment on separate corruption charges.

Shas withdrew from the coalition following a High Court of Justice ruling last September that Deri and Pinhasi had to step down from their posts to face the charges against them.

Shas, whose spiritual leader is the politically moderate Rabbi Ovadia Yosef, has always been the favorite coalition partner among Labor's doves.

For Rabin, the news from Shas is welcome indeed. Since Shas left the coalition, Rabin has governed with a narrow 61-59 majority that relies on the support of two predominately Arab parties outside the coalition.

No Israeli government has ever included the Arab parties in its coalition. Rabin has been particularly loath to base crucial national decisions, such as possible territorial compromise with the Syrians, on Arab support.

At the same time, Rabin has been aware that recent talk of reaching out to right-wing parties to help broaden the coalition has brought opposition within Labor.

Observers here say fear of the coalition moving to the right prompted the recent controversial remarks by Knesset member Nissim Zvili, the Labor Party's dovish secretary-general.

Zvili sparked a political storm by daring to predict publicly that a Palestinian state would eventually emerge from the process begun last September, when Israel agreed to grant Palestinian self-rule in the Gaza Strip and part of the West Bank.

Zvili also predicted aloud that Israel would eventually recognize Syrian sovereignty over the Golan Heights.

Zvili noted that Labor did not, as a matter of policy, favor the creation of a Palestinian state; rather it sought a Jordanian-Palestinian confederation.

But his assessment, he said, was that Labor's desire for such a joint entity would not ultimately carry the day.

An embarrassed prime minister quickly upbraided the over-dovish Zvili, while the Likud and other parties on the right made predictable hay of Labor's obvious discomfort.

But the storm of political controversy may have been deliberately seeded, according to some observers here. They Zvili made his remarks to scare away potential right-wing allies.

NAME GAME

There is a story in almost every Jewish surname and Toronto lawyer FRED M. CATZMAN has been researching their origins over the past few years. Mr. Catzman reports on his research in The CJN.

ZLOTNIK — GURARIE

Arie Zlotnick, a Montreal accountant, has asked me to find out the derivation of his family name.

Zlotnik is the Ukrainian word for goldsmith. It comes from the word zlota (gold). The same source yields the name Zlotkin, which is a matronymic name (after a female ancestor). Its English equivalent would be Golda or Goldie.

His given name is Aryeh, the Hebrew word for lion. The newly appointed House Leader in the Chretien government, Herbert Gray, was originally Gurarie (lion cub in Hebrew).

JAFI names interim chairman

Dinitz indicted for fraud, breach of trust

Jewish Telegraphic Agency/Israel

JERUSALEM — Yehiel Leket, the head of Youth Aliyah at the Jewish Agency (JAFI), has won a major skirmish in his battle to replace Simcha Dinitz as chairman of the executive.

Following his indictment for fraud and breach of trust, Dinitz took a leave of absence last week, leaving frenzied back-room dealing and calculation in his wake.

After talks Sunday night between the chairman of the Agency's board of governors, Mendel Kaplan, and Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, Leket was named interim executive chairman until June.

In a speech following the announcement of his temporary appointment, Leket spoke about instituting far-reaching changes to the Agency and projected a budget of $2.5 billion (US) and half a million new immigrants over the next five years.

Other candidates being mentioned for the permanent post include JAFI treasurer Hanan Ben-Yehuda, MK Avraham Burg and former president Yitzhak Navon. Shlomo "Chich" Lahat, until recently mayor of Tel Aviv, has also been spoken of as a leading contender.

The question of who will permanently run the $500-million-a-year Agency — the primary recipient of money raised for Israel by the United Jewish Appeal — responsible for bringing immigrants to Israel as well as providing other social and educational services, is complicated by the fact that the Agency is not organized simply along corporate lines.

Instead, it reflects two separate balances of power. One mirrors Israeli politics, with the Labor Party, which Dinitz formerly represented in the Knesset, currently wielding more power than Likud, which treasurer Ben-Yehuda represents.

Simcha Dinitz

The other is between leaders of the Diaspora fundraising organizations that pay the bills on the one hand, and the Israelis and their Diaspora Zionist allies, represented by the World Zionist Organization (WZO), who have an equal say in setting policy. The Jewish Agency chairman of the executive and other senior officials are chosen by the Israeli and Diaspora Zionists of the WZO, but must be ratified by the fundraisers.

It is likely, though not certain, that Dinitz will vacate the chairmanship before a permanent replacement is named. He has agreed to step down officially before the end of the year even if he is exonerated, or at the end of the year if his case is not completed. But he is expected to be pressed to resign earlier.

Leket, a Laborite, has the backing of the prime minister as well as of the WZO, including its Likud component. But Leket, who wants to use the position of acting chairman to build a base for his candidacy for the permanent post, is said to be fighting an uphill battle for the support of the Diaspora fundraisers.

Indeed, sources say Likud gave Leket its backing for acting chairman in the belief that the fundraisers would torpedo his candidacy for the permanent post.

Kaplan was said to be vehemently opposed to Leket's serving as chairman. Speculation was that he wanted a permanent appointment as soon as possible, with Ben-Yehuda presiding over Agency meetings in the interim, as provided in the by-laws.

Rabin's role in advancing the Leket candidacy was key. In the manoeuvering leading up to his appointment to the interim position, there was considerable speculation that Rabin would not want to push Leket hard enough to risk alienating Diaspora leaders at this sensitive time in the Middle East peace process.

On the other hand, the Diaspora leaders may have decided not to fight Rabin over what is only a temporary post.

Leket himself argued that allowing Ben-Yehuda to continue presiding over meetings instead of electing an acting chairman would violate the requirements for partnership between the Diaspora and the Zionists.

The chairman of the board of governors (the post presently held by Mendel Kaplan) is always a representative of the fundraisers, he pointed out, while the chairman of the Agency executive is always a representative of the WZO.

"If we don't elect an acting chairman (of the executive), there will be an imbalance," said Leket, "leaving only the chairman of the board with authority.

"We can't have a situation where there is no address for authority on the executive level.

"I am a candidate put forward very strongly by Rabin," Leket pointed out confidently. "If I have a chance to perform as acting chairman, I may win (the) respect and reputation" needed to secure the appointment of permanent chairman.

Young couples can't afford Jerusalem

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Like many young couples, Elana and Joe Alexander want to buy an apartment here in the capital. But, like many young Jerusalem couples, they cannot afford one.

"The housing prices here are really shocking," said Elana, a travel agent in her late 20s. "First we looked in the centre, where my father lives, but found that three-bedroom apartments cost over $200,000, way beyond our means.

"We've just started looking in the suburbs — Pisgat Ze'ev, Givat Ze'ev — places we don't really want to live. Even Ramot (a once-affordable suburb of the city) has gotten expensive. It's very frustrating to want to put down roots in Jerusalem, and not be able to do so because of lack of money," she said.

The Alexanders are among an increasing number of young Jerusalemites who do not want to leave the capital but who cannot afford to stay.

A report just released by the city's department of strategic planning reveals what many already suspected: an unprecedented number of Jerusalemites are leaving the city, primarily because of skyrocketing housing prices and limited job opportunities.

Last year, 16,700 residents left the city, compared to 15,100 in 1992. In the past four years, some 59,000 Jerusalemites moved out of the capital, while only 39,000 moved in.

And yet, despite these statistics, the city's population of 565,000 is the highest ever. This is due to the high birth rate among Jerusalem residents — 23.5 births per 1,000 residents, compared to the nationwide rate of 14.2 — and can be attributed in large part to the fervently Orthodox Jewish communities and the Arab sector.

The high birth rate notwithstanding, it is clear that Jerusalem is losing the very people it wants to attract, said Sara Hershkovitz, author of the city report.

"Most are young, educated, with young children. If this trend continues, in the long run we will have a disproportionate number of older people and a low percentage of people of working age. We're losing the best and the brightest," she said.

In a statement to reporters, Mayor Ehud Olmert said, "It is essential to keep a demographic balance here. I hope the government ministries will work with me in doing whatever is necessary to put an end to this deteriorating situation."

According to municipal spokeswoman Ruth Jaffe, creating more housing and employment opportunities are at the top of the mayor's list of priorities.

New neighborhoods

In his election platform, Olmert proposed constructing new neighborhoods on the city's outskirts, especially on the "empty hills of eastern Jerusalem." These new areas would be serviced by a peripheral road that would circle the city.

The city's job market also needs to be overhauled, according Hershkovitz. "Jerusalem has very little industry," she pointed out.

"Just 11 per cent of the workforce is employed in industry, with another 10 per cent in business and finance services. A full 45 per cent work in public and community services" — the first jobs cut when a city is financially strapped, Hershkovitz said.

Like his predecessor Teddy Kollek, Olmert sees high-tech industry as one of the keys to Jerusalem's economic future. Low on pollution and high on brain power, high-tech firms would keep many of the city's highly educated graduates in the city.

One issue not mentioned in the city's report, but which crops up in many conversations with former Jerusalemites, is the "religion factor."

Many city dwellers, as well as those who have left, believe that Jerusalem is becoming progressively more religious in tone and sensibility.

Citing a number of riots initiated by the "black hat" community in the past few years, they worry that the capital will no longer be a welcome place for secular Jews, who don't want their streets closed on Shabbat, and who go to the few pubs and restaurants that operate on Friday night.

There is also growing concern among "traditional" Jews, who are neither secular nor fervently religious, that the new mayor will favor the Haredi community that helped vote him in.

"Olmert got elected because of the Haredim, so of course he will favor them when it comes to funds for education and housing," said a Jerusalem woman who identified herself only as Shira. "That's not fair to the rest of us."

One man, who did not wish to be identified, decided to leave Jerusalem two years ago because he found the religion stifling.

"Jerusalem is a very religious city, and I found it stifling after a while," he said in a telephone interview from his Tel Aviv apartment. "I love Jerusalem, but there's nothing to do on Shabbat. I don't have a car, and since there's no public transportation on Shabbat or the holidays, I felt stuck."

He said "in Tel Aviv I'm earning 30 per cent more than what I was earning in Jerusalem, performing the same kind of work. Professionally, there are a lot more job opportunities in Tel Aviv, and the pay is much higher."

But the clincher, he said, "was my growing desire to express who I really am. I'm gay, and there is a large gay community in Tel Aviv. There's also a small gay community in Jerusalem, but people in the city are much more judgmental. I feel freer in Tel Aviv, more able to be myself."

Yet many, like the Alexanders, say they are staying put. "We'll rent in the centre of Jerusalem for a while longer, and hope that more apartments will be built, and competition will bring the prices down a bit," said Elana. "There's no place like Jerusalem. This is what living in Israel is all about."

Sarajevo Jews repay 'debt' to Muslim family

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

MEVASSERET ZION, Israel — It has been 50 years since the Hardagas, a Muslim family from Sarajevo, saved the lives of their Jewish neighbors during the darkest days of the Holocaust.

Two weeks ago, some of that "debt" was repaid when Zajniba Hartaga-Susic, 76, and her family were evacuated from the war-torn Bosnian capital in a daring rescue operation spearheaded by the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC).

Devout Muslims, the Hartagas provided refuge to three Jewish families during World War II. The Kabilios, who made aliyah in 1950, brought the Hartagas actions to the attention of the Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial in Jerusalem, which honored the family as Righteous Gentiles in 1985.

"It was then," says Zajniba, "that I fell in love with Israel."

Over the years, the Hartagas and Kabilios have maintained strong ties. In addition to the Jerusalem reunion nine years ago, the two families have corresponded whenever circumstances permitted.

Though the elder Kabilios are now deceased, Tova (Kabilio) Grinberg, who was a small child at the start of World War II, has a box full of treasured photographs and letters from the Hartagas that span more than half a century.

She is especially close to Zarfa, Zajniba's older daughter and a childhood friend, who is still in Sarajevo.

In 1992, at the start of the Yugoslav civil war, Tova invited the Hartagas to Israel for a second visit. Zarfa's daughter and grandchildren were able to leave Sarajevo, and flew to Israel for a three-month stay.

Such visits soon became impossible, however, as the civil war intensified. Sarajevo residents became virtual prisoners in their homes, due to sniper fire from warring factions surrounding the city. During the past two years, thousands have died from wounds, hunger and disease.

Despite the efforts of the United Nations and other relief organizations to gain safe passage for the neediest refugees, only a few thousand people have been rescued since the fighting began.

Evacuating the Hartagas proved to be especially difficult, says JDC field operator Eli Eliezri, because "it is very hard, and dangerous, to get Muslims through Serbian checkpoints."

But Eliezri, who has led nearly a dozen rescue operations in the former Yugoslavia, says, "we were determined to get the Hartagas safely out of Bosnia and to Israel. This was a special case because they are special people. It is a kind of payback for the assistance they gave Jews."

Join rescue convoy

Two weeks ago, the Hartagas learned that they would be among the 280 people traveling out of Sarajevo in the JDC's rescue convoy. They packed up a few belongings — photographs, an old clock, and some borrowed clothes — and bid farewell to their country.

"There is no going back," Aida, Zajniba's younger daughter, said on her arrival in Israel. "We don't intend to return to Bosnia, even if there is peace. Israel is our home now."

Aida spoke from her new home in the Mevasseret Zion Absorption Centre. Just a few days after arriving in Israel, the Hartagas — Zajniba, daughter Aida, Aida's Serbian husband Branumir, and 10-year-old granddaughter Stella — are already beginning to settle in.

Perched on a mountain a few miles outside Jerusalem, the sprawling centre, which is run by the Jewish Agency, houses 200 new immigrant families, including several from the former Yugoslavia.

Though their apartment and its furnishings are modest, the Hartagas call their new home "paradise." Having spent two years with virtually no electricity, it doesn't occur to them to turn on the lights as the sun goes down.

"I'm sorry. I forgot we have electricity," Aida tells a visitor, with an embarrassed smile. "We've gotten used to living without lights and heat. Firewood in Sarajevo is extremely scarce and expensive. To prepare our last meal, I burned a pair of shoes, and that provided enough fire to cook dinner."

Though the war has been difficult for everyone, Aida says, "it was especially hard for mother." Sitting next to her daughter on a donated sofa, Zajniba points to her right leg, which was amputated many years ago.

"I was afraid to take off my prosthesis, even when I went to sleep, for fear there would be a bomb and I would have to move around quickly," she says. "It hurt all the time."

Though she finds it difficult to get around, using a cane and sometimes a wheelchair, Zajniba, a tall, thin, woman with short gray hair, nonetheless insisted on visiting Yad Vashem on Monday, three days after arriving in Israel.

Sitting beside Tova Grinberg, in front of the tree that had been planted in the Hartagas' name nine years before, Zajniba smiled as an Israeli government representative presented her with a certificate of honorary citizenship.

The family will also receive a monthly stipend and favorable loan terms,

Will receive monthly stipend things usually reserved for Jewish immigrants who have made aliyah under the Law of Return.

"Emotionally, leaving Sarajevo wasn't all that difficult," says Zajniba, back in her apartment following the ceremony. "I had been to Israel in 1985 and spent a month here. At the time I looked carefully at how the young people lived, at the customs of the country.

"When it came time to make a decision, I tried to do what was right for my daughter and her family. They are young and need a fresh start. I also have many friends here, and at my age, all I need is peace, nothing else."

Aida says that the family is eager to integrate quickly into Israeli society. "My husband and I plan to begin Hebrew ulpan classes next week, and we have enrolled Stella in the neighborhood school, where she will meet other Israelis and learn the language."

Asked why Stella, a Muslim, isn't attending school in the Arab sector, Aida says, "I am Muslim but my husband is Serb. Our lives go beyond religious and ethnic identities. Stella is our future, and she needs to be at the heart of Israeli society."

According to Shira Ozer, the director of the absorption centre, "All of the Yugoslav families are motivated to put down roots. They've been here less than a week and already want to plant flowers in the garden, to learn Hebrew and get jobs."

Unlike many of the families from Sarajevo, however, who have little or no knowledge of Judaism and Israel, "the Hartagas know a great deal about Jewish customs," Ozer says.

By way of example, Ozer relates how "a CBS-TV film crew arrived at the centre wishing to interview the family right before Shabbat. I went into the family's apartment and told them there was a film crew outside.

"Zajniba asked me to apologize to the crew, saying that she could not do the interview at that time because it would be disrespectful to her Jewish neighbors. She asked them to come back after Shabbat, and they did."

Ultimately, it was this inherent respect for others that led the Hartagas to save Jewish lives.

"It was normal," says Zajniba, who seems embarrassed by the media attention and overwhelming outpouring of affection by strangers. "In Sarajevo we have a saying: 'If your neighbor is a good person and needs help, you must help him.' What more is there to say?"

U.S. Jews blow shofar in support of Bosnians

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — Dozens of Jews blew shofars outside the White House last Wednesday to call attention to the plight of the Bosnian people.

The event came less than two weeks after a particularly gruesome attack on the marketplace in the Bosnian capital of Sarajevo left 68 people dead and sent shockwaves throughout the world.

"The shofar is a wakeup call that we use on the High Holy Days to arouse ourselves from spiritual slumber," said Michael Feuer, president of the Washington region of the American Jewish Congress, which organized the event.

Feuer said in an interview that his group "came to realize that we have to arouse the American people," including the government, from their "spiritual slumber" over the Bosnia issue.

Jewish groups, including AJCongress, have long been calling for stronger action from the Bush and Clinton administrations to combat the "ethnic cleansing" perpetrated primarily by Serbs against Muslims in the former Yugoslav republic.

Many in the Jewish community have seen echoes of the Holocaust in the events in Bosnia-Herzegovina.

Under sunny skies, approximately 200 people gathered in snowy Lafayette Park across the street from the White House to participate in the event, which was cosponsored by numerous other Jewish organizations.

Meanwhile, Hillel groups across the country held programs to bring attention to the issue of Bosnia and raise humanitarian aid for the besieged country's citizens.

Contributions were to be sent to the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, which then would provide medical supplies, food and clothing for the Bosnians.

North of the border, Canadian Jewish Congress president Irving Abella called on the Canadian government to commence a consultation process on the situation in Bosnia.

"We applaud the valiant conduct of Canada's peacekeepers in the former Yugoslavia," Abella said. "However we feel the government must do something more. We condemn the wilful slaughter of innocent civilians and non-combatants and add our voice to the call for an immediate cessation of hostilities."

Turkey condemns anti-Semitism

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — After several Western countries refused to do so, Turkey has agreed to introduce a resolution condemning anti-Semitism before the UN Human Rights Commission.

The resolution to be introduced last week will be part of a broader statement condemning racism, discrimination, xenophobia and other forms of intolerance.

Turkey, a Muslim country, agreed to sponsor the resolution on anti-Semitism after representatives to the commission from the United States, Canada and the European Community declined, saying they had not received instructions from their governments, according to a spokesman for the World Jewish Congress.

The U.S. delegation to the commission in Geneva, headed by former vice-presidential candidate Geraldine Ferraro, had made women's issues and a resolution backing the peace initiatives in the Middle East its top priorities at the current session of the commission.

According to the WJC, several members of the U.S. delegation had argued that the potential defeat of a resolution on anti-Semitism would be harmful to the cause.

Court Rules on Property Settlements

JERUSALEM — In a landmark decision, Israel's Supreme Court has ruled that rabbinical courts must apply civil, rather than religious, law to property settlements in divorce cases.

The decision overturns a ruling by the Supreme Rabbinical Court here, which had not recognized the rights of a divorcee, Chana Bavli, to half of all assets accumulated in her marriage.

The groundbreaking ruling is sending shock waves through the religious establishment, which views it as an unprecedented erosion of its traditional jurisdiction and has vowed to resist the measure.

The pictures were judged by an international panel of photographers in Amsterdam, where the award was announced.

Israel-Namibia Establish Ties

UNITED NATIONS — Israel and the southwest African nation of Namibia have established full diplomatic relations.

At a recent ceremony in New York, diplomatic documents were signed by Israel's UN ambassador, Gad Yaacobi, and his Namibian counterpart, Tunguru Huaraka.

Namibia is the 12th country to establish diplomatic relations with Israel since Israel and the Palestine Liberation Organization signed a Declaration of Principles last September.

The Namibian ambassador said his country saw "the famous handshake between (Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak) Rabin and (PLO Chair Yasser) Arafat as a brave act and a sign of Israel's willingness to solve the problems of the Middle East."

Yaacobi said the establishment of relations was "another step for Israel toward normalization and cooperation with all the African countries."

Simcha Holzberg Dead At 70

TEL AVIV — Simcha Holzberg, affectionately known as the "father of the wounded" for his decades of volunteer work with Israeli veterans and families of victims of terrorism, died Feb. 14 after suffering a heart attack.

Holzberg, who was 70, died while attending a memorial ceremony for Israelis killed in a 1978 terrorist massacre on the coastal road.

Holzberg, a Holocaust survivor who lost his entire family at the hands of the Nazis, devoted his life here to aiding wounded veterans and the families of terrorist victims.

Despite his ever-cheerful appearance, he was said to live with memories of the Holocaust each day of his life. He used to tell people that in place of blood kin, he had the extended family of the Israel Defence Force and all its disabled veterans.

Palestinians charged in Chicago fire

The three were apparently "upset with the Jews for what they were doing to the Palestinians" in the Middle East, according to a local police commander.

The fire, which gutted a three-story classroom building at the Chicago Community Kollel Institute for Advanced Torah Studies, was one of five separate acts of vandalism and arson that took place Jan. 28. All the incidents involved Jewish institutions.

The three suspects, all of Palestinian descent and residents of the Chicago area, were each charged with one count each of arson and committing a hate crime.

After appearing in Cook County Circuit Court, where they pleaded not guilty, the three were ordered detained pending the posting of a $500,000 bond for each.

Kotler's father dies

KELOWNA — The Okanagan Jewish community honored the memory of Saul Kotler, father of past president Mel Kotler, at a memorial meeting recently in the Jewish Community Centre.

Saul Kotler of Montreal died in December at the age of 83.

Active in the insurance business in Montreal for over 50 years, the senior Kotler became a friend and ex-officio member of the Okanagan Jewish Community over the past eight years, visiting here frequently and helping raise funds for the centre, which opened last year.

Anti-Semitism Charges Investigated

WASHINGTON — The U.S. Army is investigating charges that Jewish faculty members at an Army institute in Germany were confronted with anti-Semitism and religious discrimination.

The Anti-Defamation League had requested such an inquiry in a letter last month to Secretary of the Army Togo West Jr.

The case involves Lev and Irene Yudovich, faculty members at the U.S. Army Russian Institute in Garmisch, Germany, who were suddenly dismissed in 1991 for "incompetence" after 13 years on the job.

The Yudoviches, American citizens who emigrated from Russia, claim their dismissal came as a result of widespread discrimination at the institute against Jews and Russians.

A federal judge has already ruled in the Yudoviches' favor. In a suit brought by the couple in U.S. District Court in Virginia, Judge James Cacheris found the Army guilty of discrimination against them.

In his December 1993 opinion, Cacheris found that the institute "was permeated with an anti-Semitic and anti-Russian atmosphere."

The Army, which no longer owns the institute, said it was investigating the charges.

Saudis To Buy U.S. Planes

WASHINGTON — Saudi Arabia has agreed to purchase $6 billion in commercial aircraft from U.S. companies, President Bill Clinton announced last week.

At a White House news conference, Clinton and Commerce Secretary Ron Brown said the Saudis had decided to replace their civilian fleet of approximately 50 planes with aircraft made by Boeing Co. and McDonnell Douglas Corp.

The Jewish community has long kept a watchful eye on purchases of American technology by Arab countries, especially those with military applications. In this case, where only commercial aircraft were involved, the major American Jewish watchdog groups had no comment on the sale.

Saudi Prince Bandar, appearing at the White House with Clinton and Brown, said the relationship between Saudi Arabia and the United States was "very strong."

Croation Leader Apologizes

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Croatian President Franjo Tudjman apologized last week to the Jewish community for sections of a book he wrote that are widely viewed as anti-Semitic.

In a letter to B'nai B'rith president Kent Schiner, Tudjman promised the English-language version of the book, soon to be distributed in the United States, will not contain the offending sections.

In his letter, Tudjman said the negative reaction from Jews around the world to his book "has affected me deeply and has caused me to re-examine my statements and to re-evaluate those parts of the book in which I cited documents and personal views of some writer or participant."

Vertigo Caused Fatal Crash

TEL AVIV — Pilot vertigo caused the helicopter crash which last month killed the military officer in charge of the West Bank, according to the findings of an investigating commission.

The crash killed Maj. Gen. Nechemia Tamari, the head of the Israel Defence Force's Central Command, his aide and two pilots.

Investigators said the pilots were disoriented as they sought to land at Central Command headquarters north of Jerusalem amid high winds and blinding low clouds.

The commission's findings were based on radio transmissions before the crash, a close inspection of the site of the accident and examination of the debris, as the Bell-206 helicopter has no "black box" logging in-flight activity.

Tamari, his aide and the pilots had been returning to their base after overseeing a search for reported Jordanian infiltrators in the Beit She'an Valley.

The crash has raised so-far unanswered questions about whether senior officers should fly around the country to inspect every report of an incursion or incident.

Rabbinical Reflections

Purim

By RABBI AARON LEVINE

The Mishnah in Avos (Chapters of the Fathers 4:21) teaches us that pursuit of honor causes one to forfeit his life. One can interpret this to mean life in this world, or alternatively, life in the World to Come, or perhaps both. The Talmud (Eiruvin 13b) also teaches us that one who runs after honor and greatness will see that honor flee from him. Conversely, we are taught that one who runs away from honor, honor will indeed run after and pursue him. When we read the megillah with the commentary of the Talmud and the sages, these lessons become obvious.

Ahasverus, who ruled the world and had all the honor he wanted, was not satisfied. He had been an ordinary barber by profession but managed to usurp the throne and marry Vashti the granddaughter of Nebuchadnezzar. Marrying into royalty gave his monarchy some legitimacy but this fact gnawed away at him. He didn't want the throne on Vashti's merits he wanted it on his own merits. He therefore had to still the voices that reminded him of this and prove that he was above and superior to Vashti. So what does the King do to his beloved and beautiful wife in order to satisfy his desire for kovod, for honor? He demands that she show total subservience to him by parading herself immodestly before all of the nobles and princes of the land. That will show them who truly runs the monarchy.

Vashti for her part was no modest woman. According to the Talmud she would have willingly participated, together with all the women she had gathered at her party, in the lewdness and immorality which Ahasverus was trying to promote. But she had her own honor to defend. My husband, a commoner, a former barber, is going to tell me, the royal princess whose very veins flow with royal blood, what to do! Never! And she refused. The outcome of all of this was that Ahasverus lost his beautiful wife and his beautiful wife lost her life.

Nation bowed to Haman

Let's take a look at the other archvillain of the Megillah, Haman. The king elevated him to second in command. The entire nation had to bow down to him and did so. Could any one person ever attain such honor in his lifetime? But no, that was not enough. One single Jew, Mordechai, lo yichra velo yishtachaveh, would not bend the knee or bow to him. This so enraged him that he was willing to vent his wrath against the entire Jewish nation — men, women, and children, to such an extent that he wanted to totally destroy them. Why? For that brekele kovod, for that little piece of honor he was lacking. The megillah describes Haman's downfall and humiliation very vividly.

On the other hand, we have Mordechai the humble Jew seeking to distance himself from any honor. What happens to him? He is led through the streets of Shushan by none other than Haman himself who had to proclaim, "so shall be done to the man whom the king wishes to honor." And in the end, Mordechai was indeed greatly honored by the king. He was elevated to Haman's high position and became one of the heroes of the Purim story.

The Chofetz Chaim explains why one can forfeit his world by the pursuit of honor. Generally we have a rule that one cannot be fully paid with physical reward in this world for any mitzvah he performs. Performance of a mitzvah is so spiritual and so great that it can only be rewarded in a world of eternity (sechar mitzvah behai alma leka, Kiddushin 39b). But honor is not a physical reward, it is spiritual and intangible. You can't touch, smell, see, hear, or taste honor. Therefore one could be paid in this world with honor for performing mitzvot.

'Honor is like a Shabbos kugel'

The Chofetz Chaim once travelled to another city and, prior to his departure, sent word to his relatives but asked that no one be informed of his impending arrival. He didn't like the honor that was given to him by the thousands who thronged to greet him wherever he went. Word leaked out somehow and a crowd of people were at the station to greet him. It took all the available persuasive powers of his family to entice him to leave the train. When asked what was so terrible about a little honor that the people wanted to give him so willingly on their own, he responded:

"Honor is like a Shabbos kugel. If you eat it up before Shabbos, there is none left for Shabbos. Honor is reserved for a person in the World to Come. If one is truly deserving of honor, he will receive it in the true World of honor. But if one receives his honor in this world there will be no honor left for him later."

It's amazing that so many of us have not learned the above lessons. How easily one gets offended. How easily one feels slighted. How easily one feels he has not received the proper honor. He wasn't given the right aliyah (Torah honor). He wasn't honored with being the cantor. He wasn't given the seat at the head table or elsewhere befitting his stature. He wasn't recognized publicly. He didn't get the proper write-up in the newspaper. How one ruins his life, his marriage, his job, his position, his relationship with family and friends over a little bit of false pride and honor seeking!

But we should remember that what we may not seek for ourselves, we should nevertheless endeavor to do for others. Such is the case with many attributes. I should not pursue honor for myself. But I should do everything in my power to honor others. I should not be concerned with the respect that others give me but I should be concerned with respecting them. And ultimately, "ayzehu mechubad, hamechabed es habriyos — who is an honored person, one who honors others." (Avos 4:1)

There are times when one must demand honor. Never should a parent, for example, allow a child to get away with dishonoring him. To do so is tantamount to helping the child disobey the fifth commandment. But it is always wiser to remember that it is better to command honor from children than demand it. And so it is with others. Our Gedolim did not demand honor. They commanded it by honoring others, and the people readily gave true honor back to them, as in the case of the Chofetz Chaim above. At the same we must remember whenever and wherever possible to treat everyone, even young children, with respect. That's how they will learn to respect their elders and their peers, something which, unfortunately, is sorely lacking in our society today.

So this Purim let's learn one of the fascinating lessons of the Megillah and keep the kugel for Shabbat! Chag Somayach.

By RABBI AARON LEVINE

We are told that in the times of Mashiach all holidays will become extinct except for Purim. What lesson lies in Purim that makes its message eternal?

If we were to choose two words from the Megillah (the Book of Esther) that characterize the entire episode of Purim, they would be "venehafoch hu," the words in Verse one, Chapter 9 which reads: "... in the day that the enemies of the Jews hoped to rule over them — and it was turned around, the Jews ruled over their enemies."

A casual perusal of the Megillah reveals many places where one would think that the outcome would be one way, where events would seemingly predict one outcome — and yet just the opposite becomes true. For instance, it would seem Vashti would emerge as a powerful queen; but she was beheaded, and a Jewish woman (a member of the vile enemy of Haman and Ahasverus) actually became the beloved queen. We would predict that Haman would emerge as the powerful second in command to the ruler; his plans to destroy the Jews would be successful (there was no logical impediment to his plans which were sealed with the approval of the king himself). But Haman and his sons were hanged, the Jews ruled over their enemies and Mordechai emerged as the powerful second in command. And so on throughout the Megillah.

The Talmud tells us of Rabbi Yosef the son of Rabbi Yehoshua ben Levi who returned to this world and was asked by his father what he had seen in the other world. He responded: "Olom hafuch ra'eesee (I saw a topsy-turvy world) — elyonim lematah vetachtonim lemaalah (those who are held in great respect and have high positions over here were at the bottom over there, and those at the bottom over here were on top over there)." His father retorted, "My son you saw a clear world." (Pesachim 50a.)

Examine Jewish history throughout the ages and we shall see many periods where the Jews were at the bottom. We shall observe periods of history that do not make sense to us. Why is the chosen nation, if it is chosen, constantly being battered? Look what the Antiochuses, the Hamans, the Crusaders, the Torquemadas, the Chielmenickis, the Stalins, the Hitlers, the Husseins and the rest of them, have done to us!

Answers HaShem: "kee lo machshevosai machshevoseichem"(for My thoughts are unlike yours). You cannot comprehend all the cheshbonos (calculations and reckonings) that I have ordained for the world. You cannot visualize the steps that are necessary for the ultimate outcome. But there will come a time when all nations will believe in God. There will come a time when all will thirst for knowledge of God. There will come a time when the lion will pasture with the sheep, when nations will beat their weaponry into pruning utensils. It will be a venehafoch hu (a complete turnaround), and those who were downtrodden and at the bottom in the eyes of the world right now, will be tipped topsy-turvy, and turned for all to see as the esteemed ones, as the chosen ones.

We might think that this all makes for nice sermonizing but is it far from reality? Are there any of us who would have honestly predicted that the impregnable Iron Curtain would fall? Seventy years of tyranny and oppression. Seventy years of obliteration of any form of religion, especially the Jewish religion. Have we not witnessed with our very own eyes in modern times the crashing down of the curtain? Have we not seen the miracle of the open establishment of Torah learning and yeshivot in what was formerly Soviet Russia? And this is just the beginning.

If we remember to re-enact a few more words of the Megillah, keemu vekiblu, as the Talmud explains, keemu ma shekiblu kevar — that the Jews repented and reaffirmed what they had once accepted — to cherish and to observe the laws of the Holy Torah, then we will very speedily see the rest of the venehafoch hu.

So Purim eternally symbolizes the hope that, despite our witnessing the bleak events, ultimately all will lead to triumph, to justice, to a fulfilment of our destiny as the light unto the nations. We need this holiday even in times of Mashiach as a reminder to look back at history and see all the chains of events in this manner. To recognize that even the seemingly bad was ultimately only for the good. May that time quickly come, bimhera beyameinu, speedily in our days. Amen!

Vatican to commemorate the Shoah

Concert set for Yom Hashoah

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

ROME — The Vatican will hold a concert in memory of the 6 million Jews who perished in the Holocaust, a spokesman announced.

The concert will be held at the Vatican on Yom Hashoah, or Holocaust Remembrance Day, which this year falls on April 7.

A Vatican statement described the Holocaust as "a terrible abyss which has thrown a black light on the terrifying depth of human evil."

A concert, the statement said, would be the best way to commemorate the Shoah, since music is the best way of reaching people's souls.

"The intent of the concert is to unite the hearts of those who hear it in the memory of terrible events, which should never be forgotten so that they are never repeated," the statement said.

The announcement of the Vatican concert came just six weeks after the Vatican and Israel signed their historic agreement to establish full diplomatic relations.

Rabbi A. James Rudin, interreligious affairs director for the American Jewish Committee, was involved in planning the event. He said the concert demonstrates the pope's commitment to the furthering of Catholic-Jewish relations.

"It's one more sign of the enormous sea change that's taken place between Catholics and Jews," Rabbi Rudin said.

The concert, to be held in the Vatican's modern Paul VI auditorium, will be attended by Pope John Paul II, Rome's chief rabbi, Elio Toaff, and other senior religious officials.

It will include Kol Nidre by Max Bruch, the adagio of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, and Psalm 92 as arranged by Franz Schubert for the 1826 inauguration of a Viennese synagogue.

Concluding the concert will be selections from Leonard Bernstein's Kaddish Symphony, which includes the recitation of the Jewish prayer for the dead, and two of his Chichester Psalms, which also contain passages in Hebrew.

The concert will be performed by the London Philharmonic Orchestra in conjunction with the Vatican's Cappella Giulia Choir.

Leading the orchestra will be Gilbert Levine, an American conductor who has spent more than three years attempting to arrange such a concert.

Originally, he had hoped to be able to have it outdoors, in Rome's historic Jewish ghetto.

Front Line

Rabin-Peres differences are subdued but still alive

By YESHAYAHU ANUG

The timetable for the implementation of the agreement concluded in September is very much behind its initial schedule. This is not too surprising because the document dealt with principles. The same is true of the recent Shimon Peres-Yasser Arafat talks in Cairo, where a number of serious hurdles were eliminated, leaving many details to be finalized by the parties.

Yeshayahu Anug

This means more weeks of hard bargaining, before implementation can hopefully begin. There was more serenity and rapprochement between the parties in Cairo than on earlier occasions. At the same time their constituencies are getting increasingly sceptical and impatient and this poses serious problems. Agreements are reached by concessions, these stimulate internal opposition and when oppositions are appeased, things go sour again.

It would serve no practical purpose to go into the issues that are still to be tackled. There are so many and they are complex. More important is to look at the state of mind of the negotiators, who represent the diametrically opposed expectations of their respective constituencies and must bring them closer to what reality dictates. This is not a task for which politicians anywhere like to volunteer.

While Israeli leaders try nevertheless to maintain the momentum of peacemaking — the Palestinian leadership is not even in place and can hardly influence the public mood in the streets of Gaza or Nablus by remote control from Tunis. These conditions cannot go on for much longer without threatening the process, however advanced it may already appear to be.

In Israel there is bitterness now over the flare-up of Hamas terror. In the territories, where the vague hope for peace is obscured by the ongoing security operations and by their costs in human lives, the mood is much bleaker. While the leaders on both sides become more realistic and even more understanding of the other side's real dilemmas, they sense that significant sectors of their own publics regard the whole process as not being advantageous to their interests. Mutual distrust at the grassroots is much stronger than the aspired increase in confidence, that the Oslo agreement was meant to promote. The tension in the territories is high and will surely grow if terror goes on and will force the authorities to seal them off once again.

If this is the complex atmosphere that accompanies the Israeli-Palestinian dialogue, a meaningful exchange with Syria has not even started. The ambiguous results of the Bill Clinton-Hafez al-Assad meeting have yet to be followed by upgraded Syrian-Israeli negotiations. Nothing seems to be moving.

Both sides know exactly what the costs and the rewards of an agreement must be; neither volunteers to make the first step. Lebanon will not act without Syrian approval and in the meantime Assad allows Hezbollah to act against Israel in the south, as if to show his hand. And the advance draft of a peace treaty with Jordan will not surface before serious progress can be proven on the other fronts. King Hussein cannot be expected to act otherwise.

At the Cairo meeting with Arafat, Peres managed to get the best possible deal on some pressing security issues in the Gaza Strip and in the Jericho area. In return, Arafat obtained a number of political concessions in the form of symbols of Palestinian identity and self-rule, which he considers all-important and likely to lead, in due course, to statehood or something like it.

But the agreement got a mixed reaction here and a gloomy reception by the Arab community in the territories, who regard Arafat's concessions as excessive and humiliating. The two main features of the agreement were: the recognition of Israeli primacy in the control of the borders of the two Palestinian self-rule enclaves with Jordan and Egypt; and the security arrangements in the Gaza Strip designed to protect all the Israeli settlements there. This concerns not only the two settlement clusters at the edges of the narrow Strip but also the isolated one of Netzarim, inhabited by only 28 families, whose security will have to be provided by an elaborate and very costly defence system. Only if the minute details are finalized and after formal ratification by Yitzhak Rabin and Arafat, who may have to meet, shall the new arrangements be made on the ground. Meanwhile Rabin, who praised the agreement, seems to be in no hurry to rush things and Arafat, worried by rising internal criticism, shows some hesitation and may even back off again. It's a long way to go.

Without underrating the objective and psychological difficulties of the peace process and without underestimating the very bizarre, often maddening style of decision making in the Palestinian camp, one must admit that Israel holds nearly all the cards and wonders why Rabin, if really convicted that peace can at all be promoted at this point in time, does not play them more vigorously.

The narrow margin of his government's majority in the Knesset is only part of the answer, because he should know that his image as a trusted and very security-minded leader is intact and that he can, if need be, carry the support of the majority of Israel's citizens. Or does he doubt it? At the moment the official Likud opposition is divided, unconvincing and loosing terrain and the noisy manifestations of the rightist extremists are too obscene to be effective.

What else then? The conduct of the peace process by Israel is in the experienced hands of Rabin and Peres and although Peres generally calls the shots and takes most initiatives, Rabin, as prime minister, is the one, who by his support takes the ultimate responsibility for decisions. The two are, on the face of it, co-operating better now than ever after nearly a lifetime of rivalry and mutual distrust, but it seems that their reactions to emerging situations are very different.

It is impossible to say at this point whose long term approach is the right one. The very existence of their tactical differences, which are as regularly settled between them as they are leaked by their entourages, can not be ignored, even if denied by the two protagonists themselves. They are both irreplaceable as a team but their uneasy personal relationship has a damaging effect on Israel's bargaining posture in the peace process to which both of them are so strongly committed.

Japan shifts resources as Mideast picture changes

By DEBORAH KALB

Within the American Jewish community here, Japan has never been viewed as a positive force in Middle East affairs.

But now, especially in the wake of the historic Israel-PLO accord, there is a sense among American Jewish and Israeli officials that Japan is beginning to play a useful role in the region.

"There really has been a flurry of activity" which "all points to a real front and centre role for Japan," said Dan Mariaschin, director of international, governmental, and Israel affairs for B'nai B'rith, who recently returned from a trip to Japan sponsored by the Japanese government.

In the past, Japan was best known in pro-Israel circles for its adherence to the Arab economic boycott of Israel and for the public fascination with anti-Semitic literature.

However, in recent years, especially since the 1991 Gulf War, Japan has been seeking a prominent role in the Middle East.

"We tried to make, where possible, contributions in international conflicts," said Hideo Sato, first secretary in the political section of the Japanese Embassy in Washington.

"The Middle East was one area where we thought we could play a positive role because of our good relations with Arab countries," Sato said.

And to play that role, the Japanese government had to upgrade its relations with Israel, Sato noted.

The Japanese are now talking about being more "evenhanded" in their dealings with the Middle East, Jewish leaders say.

To most American Jews, the term "evenhanded" when used in connection with the Middle East has a negative connotation.

But Mariaschin said that in this case the term should be construed positively.

Japanese and Israeli officials have been exchanging visits, and Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and his new Japanese counterpart, Morihiro Hosokawa, are expected to host each other on reciprocal visits this coming year.

On the economic side, where Japan is a global powerhouse, the two countries have increased their trade relations fourfold since 1986, according to Mariaschin.

In 1992, Sato said, trade between Israel and Japan totalled $1.7 billion, and Japan is now Israel's second-largest trading partner after the United States.

Japanese officials have started speaking out against the Arab boycott, and most big Japanese companies are now dealing with Israel.

This contrasts sharply with the many years when Japan adhered strongly to the boycott, which negatively affects both Israel and companies doing business with Israel.

An island nation, Japan has been heavily dependent on Arab oil over the years.

As befits an economic superpower, Japan pledged $200 million over two years at the recent donors conference held in Washington to raise money for Palestinian development projects.

Israel, which sees the importance of Palestinian economic development in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, strongly backed the idea of the donors conference.

But Japan's involvement in the peace process has gone beyond its traditional financial role.

Japan has spearheaded talks on the environment between Israel, Arab participants and others, as part of the multilateral phase of the peace process. Two rounds of those talks were held in Tokyo.

And Japan, which has an economic relationship with Iran, recently tried to encourage Teheran to support the Israeli-Palestinian declaration of principles.

"Usually our policy is not to isolate any country," said Sato.

"We are trying to persuade the Iranians to take more moderate measures," including curbing its opposition to the peace process and exerting its influence on rejectionist groups like Hezbollah in Lebanon, he said.

Jewish leaders here have said such activity is useful and should continue.

Still, Jewish and Israeli officials also have said there are some areas in which they are hoping for further changes in Japanese behavior.

"There is more to be done," said Mariaschin. "I'm not saying the millennium is here."

They would like Japan to take stronger measures against the Arab boycott.

"To a great extent, the Arab boycott as has been practiced in Japan has been downsized," said Neil Sandberg, the director of the Los Angeles-based Pacific Rim Institute of the American Jewish Committee, which was founded in 1988 in response to the upsurge of anti-Semitic literature in Japan.

"But there are still some residues of caution and even fear on the part of some Japanese companies," Sandberg said.

In addition, it would be an important sign if Japan were to open a trade office in Israel, as it has done in Egypt and the Persian Gulf, Jewish leaders said.

Such a move would "send a very important message to Israelis and Jewish businessmen that it's OK to engage in trade with Israel," Mariaschin said.

Japan is still holding back on opening an office because of "budgetary problems," said Sato, laughing as he explained that even Japan has problems with its budget.

But he said such an office was a future possibility, considering the robust trade relationship between the two countries.

In addition to progress on these economic issues, both Israeli and American Jewish leaders think much more needs to be done to curb the spread of anti-Semitic literature in Japan.

Anti-Semitism in Japan is a strange phenomenon, because most Japanese do not come in contact with Jews or know very much about Jewish traditions.

The Jewish population in Japan numbers 1,000 at most, Sandberg said. But many Japanese are fascinated by anti-Semitic books, which sell at newsstands and kiosks, and people buy them in large quantities, including versions of Protocols of the Elders of Zion, the Czarist-era anti-Semitic forgery.

Sato said he has discussed with American Jewish organizations the idea of establishing an information center in Japan that would promote understanding of Jewish issues. — (JTA)

Modern Orthodox share the military burden

By NECHEMIA MEYERS

While the ultra-Orthodox continue to shirk military service, the modern Orthodox now bear their share of Israel's defence burden.

This reflects a change in the value system of the modern Orthodox, as can be seen at a farming village of observant families midway between Tel Aviv and the Gaza Strip. Some of of the founding fathers, men now in their 50s, managed to avoid military service altogether. And those who did serve — with just two exceptions — either worked as clerks in behind-the-lines units or checked up on the kashrut of army kitchens and presided over Passover seders within the framework of the Israel Defence Force rabbinate.

Their sons, in contrast, volunteer for the toughest assignments the army can offer. Indeed, at the present time, a half-dozen of the young men are in crack commando units, while most of the rest are in other front-line outfits. Not a single one is in the military rabbinate.

These religious boys are readily accepted by the secular youngsters with whom they serve, which might not have been the case some years ago. When, for example, yeshiva-trained Yochanan and Shmulik arrived at the training centre of a prestigious commando formation in the early 1980s, it quickly became clear that the commander — a tough kibbutznik with little use for the Orthodox — was not pleased to see the new recruits. And he didn't hide his disgust when army regulations forced him to bestow "privileges" on them, like the right to go on weekend leave in time to get home before the onset of the Sabbath.

No concessions were made in other spheres. Thus Yochanan and Shmulik had to get up a half hour before their fellow soldiers in order to say their morning prayers and put on their phylacteries — no small sacrifice in view of the fact that "sleeping time" was usually three or four hours a night.

The willingness of the two young men to forego a precious 30 minutes of sleep because of their religious convictions and their gung ho performance in exercises gradually won over the non-observant members of their platoon. Also contributing to their acceptance was the fact that every Friday, when the unit was within driving distance, Yochanan's mother would send the soldiers home-baked challahs for their Sabbath meals.

The non-religious soldiers showed their respect for Yochanan and Shmulik by being careful to separate utensils for meat and milk, a distinction to which they would otherwise have paid scant attention. And when all the young men went out together for an evening meal, it was always to a kosher restaurant.

Influence ran in both directions, with the two Orthodox soldiers also learning to respect — though not to accept — the values and attitudes of their secularist comrades.

Some religious boys prefer to join "yeshivot hesder" and thus to serve in special units made up entirely of observant soldiers, units where they feel more at home and where it is easier to maintain religious practices. Yochanan has no objection to "yeshivot hesder," but says that observant soldiers can readily hold their own in a predominantly secular environment "if they receive proper spiritual preparation before being called up."

The issue of mixed or separate units continues to be debated among the modern Orthodox. But all are proud to see the increasingly important role being played by their young men in the defence of Israel.

Bulgaria's record

Israel Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin was expressing the Jewish teaching about hakarat tovah (gratitude) when he celebrated the virtues of one nation — Bulgaria — that had been instrumental in saving Jews during the Holocaust.

Because of the alchemy of history and the sad fate of peoples under communism, it had been difficult in the past to officially recognize the exertions of Bulgaria on behalf of its Jews during World War II. Yet Bulgaria, like Denmark, stands out among European nations for the heroic role it played in succoring Jews.

The prime minister paid homage to Bulgaria during the visit of its president, Zhelyn Zhelco, to the Knesset in December 1993. Said Rabin: "If we did not have the opportunity until now to tell you and your people, we do so now. In the name of the Jewish people, the citizens of Israel, we extol your courage and generosity in difficult times and say to you from the bottom of our hearts — thank you."

In responding to Rabin's words, the Bulgarian president quoted from secret German documents sent by Berlin's ambassador to Sofia in the 1940s, in which the German envoy complained about Sofia's efforts to block the rounding up of Jews.

It is not easy to explain why Bulgarians went out of their way to save Jews. Historians and ethicists of the future would do well to examine the psychological and moral ingredients which produced such a response to tyranny.

It is most appropriate, in view of its remarkable record, that Israel should view Bulgaria as a favored nation in Israeli eyes and that the relationship is being translated into solid economic cooperation.

The visit of Bulgarian President Zhelco was the occasion for a series of memoranda which will lead to co-operation between Israel and Bulgaria in tourism, shipping, agriculture, veterinary science and environmental matters. It is hoped that Bulgarian-Israeli relations will grow from strength to strength.

A major appointment

Last month, a politically significant appointment was announced by Israel's Foreign Ministry. Yussuf Haj-Yihya, a retired judge from the town of Taiba, was named Israel's ambassador to Finland. Ordinarily, such announcements pass unnoticed, since Israel constantly juggles its growing diplomatic corps. But the fact that an Israeli Arab, the first, will fill an ambassadorial post is truly newsworthy. It is to be hoped that this appointment is indicative of the government's interest in and commitment to fully integrating Arab citizens into the Israeli mainstream.

Israeli Arabs, whether Muslims, Christians or Druze, comprise 18 per cent of Israel's population. They are largely the descendants of approximately 160,000 Palestinian Arabs who did not leave the newly-born Jewish state during the 1948-49 Arab-Israeli war. Under Israel's Declaration of Independence, the Arabs of Israel are guaranteed absolute equality with Jews.

In practice, however, the picture is quite different. There are glaring inequities in the allocation of municipal funds, with the result that unpaved roads and poor sewage systems are a blight on Arab towns. Arab schools are lamentably underfunded, with a shortage of classrooms, libraries and laboratory equipment. Unemployment among Arab high school and university graduates is far higher than among Jews. Israeli corporations, particularly those in the defence sector, rarely hire Arabs. And although Israeli Arabs are a sizeable minority, no Arab has yet been appointed a full cabinet minister. All too often, Israeli Arabs feel like second-class citizens. As a World Zionist Organization pamphlet euphemistically puts it, "The integration of Israeli Arabs into the national society is far from complete."

However, there has been progress. Military rule in Arab villages and towns was abolished in 1966. In comparison to Arab countries, Israel's Arab community has attained a reasonable standard of living. Illiteracy and mortality rates have fallen drastically. The number of Arabs attending post-secondary educational institutes has increased markedly.

More recently, the Israeli government of Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin has, among other promises, pledged to close municipal budgetary gaps; to eliminate disparties in education; and to absorb Arab university graduates into the civil service. And in important gestures, two Israeli Arabs have been the recipients of deputy ministerships.

The appointment of Yussuf Haj-Yihya to an ambassadorship caps these incremental developments. And though it would be unrealistic to believe that Israeli Arabs can attain all their rights while the Arab-Israeli dispute remains unresolved, the naming of an Israeli Arab ambassador is surely a sign that Israel's present government regards the issue with the seriousness it deserves.

IT MUST BE A RECORD

In what must be a Jewish world record, eight brothers (and their nephew) entered the covenant of Abraham virtually simultaneously when all the siblings — plus one — were circumcised in one morning. The parents came on aliyah just three months ago from St. Petersburg with their 12 children. Dr. Cyril Fine, a family doctor and mohel from Petach Tikvah was the architect of this feat of religious surgery. [Israni photo]

Letters to the Editor

Letters are welcome if they are brief, in English or French, typewritten with lines double spaced, and of interest to our reading public. Readers are cautioned not to make sweeping claims against persons or institutions which they cannot verify, as libel laws are very stringent. We reserve the right to edit and condense letters, which must bear the sender's address, phone number and both handwritten and typed signatures.

SARAJEVO ACTION GIVES HOPE

I was very pleased to see the headline on the front page of The CJN on Feb. 10, "JDC-led convoy evacuates 296 out of Sarajevo." It gives me some reassurance, despite the pain and frustration I feel, that people actually care about the current situation.

Even though many organizations are doing their best in trying to save lives, unfortunately many lives are still lost every day, by acts of insanity, resembling those of World War II in which almost 20 million people lost their lives.

I, as a 16-year-old, cannot stand this any longer. This war has been raging on for more than a year and a half now. How long will it take for the world to intervene and stop the monstrosities that are happening?

My main objective is to make people aware of what is happening and to stress the gravity of the problem. I write to newspapers and to known political figures hoping that they will take my letters to heart and consider the situation as if they were actually in it.

BEILIN'S VIEWS DANGEROUS

Whether Rabin called Yossi Beilin's remarks "idiotic" as you reported, or "moronic" as was reported in another Toronto paper (the Toronto Star, Feb. 6) the fact is that Beilin remains "the most important and influential shaper of policy in the current Rabin administration" (Jerusalem Report, Dec. '93).

The damage done to Israel-Diaspora relations will be repaired, as Diaspora Jews will not turn their backs on Israel because of Beilin's destructive words. However, the damage he can still do to the future security of Israel by his influential role in the peace process is of far greater concern.

INTERFAITH ACTION

The Feb. 3 article on Montreal Jews and Catholics by Janice Arnold stated that "interfaith dialogue has largely taken place between Christian clergy and Jewish lay people." The article cites one notable rabbinic exception.

Montreal can be proud of dialogue which began 50 years ago with Rabbi Harry Joshua Stern of blessed memory and continues in the dialogue and study taking place under the aegis of the James D. Raymond Interfaith Institute of Clergy at Temple Emanu-El-Beth Sholom.

The next meeting on April 15 reflects the work of Rabbi Leigh Lerner in maintaining the Institute and in Christian-Jewish Dialogue of Montreal, where he serves as a vice-president.

LOST MUSIC CANTOR

It is a great pity you did not mention my esteemed colleague Cantor David Lefkowitz in your article on the film on composer David Nowakowsky. Cantor Lefkowitz has labored almost 15 years restoring and editing the music, and it was he, not I, who was responsible for its rediscovery in the basement of Hebrew Union College.

The concert date has been changed to Wednesday, June 8.

JEWS POSTED TO MUSLIM JOBS

The [Jewish Telegraphic Agency] article titled "Jewish lawyer to assume diplomatic post in Morocco," (The CJN, Jan. 13) can at best be described as misinformed. The author, Hillel Kuttler, presents the posting of an American Jew as ambassador to an Arab country as something of an anomaly.

In his article, Kuttler writes that the United States State Department could not verify whether Marc Ginsberg is the first Jewish U.S. ambassador to an Arab country. Had the author continued in his attempt to research American Jewish history he would have been surprised to discover that a number of Jewish Americans have represented the United States in Arab and Muslim countries. Two examples are Mordecai Manuel Noah, who served as consul general in Tunis during the Madison administration, and Oscar Straus, who represented the United States in Istanbul (although the Ottoman Empire was ruled by Turks, many of its citizens were Arabs).

This pattern of appointing Jewish ambassadors to predominantly Muslim countries is not limited to the United States. Many Western European countries have also sent a disproportionately large number of Jewish ambassadors to Arab and predominantly Muslim countries.

The leaders of these nations believed that Jews would relate and interact better with the Arab or Muslim population than their fellow Christian citizens for two reasons. Firstly, they reasoned that the friction between Christian states and Muslim states would be less salient if a Jew were to represent the Christian nation. Secondly, the role of the Court Jew (as advisor and purveyor) factored into their decision. The leaders of the Christian nations believed that a special rapport would be more likely to develop between the Court Jew and a Jewish ambassador.

Had the journalist been more than perfunctory in his investigation he would have surely stumbled across the information I have adumbrated in this letter.

Kuttler makes reference to an enigmatic group of "Middle East analysts here [who] believe his appointment probably would have been inconceivable but for strides in the peace process." I find this sentence extremely difficult to accept. Why are the analysts' identities not revealed? And what is meant by "here?" This sentence is an example of poor journalism. It implies (with no factual basis) that we owe a Jew being appointed ambassador to an Arab country to the recent strides in the peace process.

DON'T NEGLECT CULTURE

Every time I open The CJN I come across articles and writings about new ways and new schemes on how to raise additional funds. Is that what Judaism is all about?

My friends and acquaintances are beginning to ask each other what the various organizations have been doing with all the billions in funds they have been collecting over the past 45 years.

How much of campaign funds are being used for Jewish culture? And especially for the promotion of our rich and beloved Yiddish culture, including music, song and dance, literature, etc.?

Our men and women of culture are starving for attention. They need moral and financial support. Much is demanded of them from the Jewish community and from the non-Jewish world, but they lack encouragement and inspiration. No wonder our young people are losing heart and assimilating.

The time has come to reintroduce the study of Yiddish language and culture in our school curriculum, if we are truly concerned about our Jewish identity, and lately much in the news, Jewish continuity. . .

I have rediscovered travel by train

By RABBI W. GUNTHER PLAUT

I have recently rediscovered train travel, and must say that it was a pleasant, even invigorating experience. My wife and I wanted to visit our children and grandchildren in the Detroit area over the winter holidays and — with snowstorms looming — we decided to go by train. We had recently tried it when travelling to Montreal and we had liked it.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut

For those of us with long memories, train travel was the preferred mode of going from one place to a distant second. My first acquaintance with North America came via the rails when my friends and I travelled from New York to Cincinnati, where I was slated to go to Hebrew Union College.

When my wife and I took up our first rabbinical post in Chicago, we travelled by train. We would have probably driven there if we had had a car. But that luxury item was still in the future and we had not yet joined this continent's love affair with the automobile.

People sometimes make good-humored fun of me because of my penchant for punctuality, something that was drummed into me by my parents and, I suppose, by the European rail system. Trains left the station on the minute and were expected to arrive exactly when scheduled. Swiss trains especially had a reputation for being punctual to the very second. It was the kind of reliability that was part of the olden days.

Eventually we became automobile owners, with all the vagaries that such ownership implies: there is never an exact time one leaves for a trip and no precise time when one arrives. A little earlier, a little later — it makes no difference.

Then came plane travel, with time hazards all its own. Quite amazingly, planes leave and depart more or less when scheduled, but weather, overcrowding, or other developments often interfere seriously with one's schedule. Before you leave home it is better to call up and find out whether you will indeed take off on time, and then you go, hoping that what you heard was the truth.

In Toronto, they open the train for boarding 20 minutes before departure, and the long line in old Union Station seemed forbidding. But not for long. As we found out, a kind of camaraderie prevails amongst the travellers. They talk with each other, are helpful with luggage, and generally create the type of atmosphere that is quite absent in plane travel. The hours we spent travelling to Windsor and back again flew by. I had my computer with me, my wife was ensconced in her own work, and there were conversations with others. It was snowing and we were glad we had chosen the train instead of committing ourselves to the hazards of the road.

As I look back on it, I think it was not only pleasure and relaxation but also nostalgia which left its mark on the experience. I remember how on my first visit to Israel (in 1935 it was still Palestine), I travelled from Haifa to Tel Aviv. It was a slow ride but safe and pleasurable.

I also found out that some of my friends have felt that way for some time, and while for long distances, we are committed to the plane, there is that undefinable intermediate space where the train fits in.

Since our last journey I have become acquainted with all sorts of new information.

I did not know, for instance, that there is a National Association of Railroad Passengers, that there is a publication called Transport 2000 Canada, which features such articles as: Are auto-free cities possible?; How can car dependence be cut?; The auto's legacy of death; and the like. These publications stress the environmental benefits of rail transportation, as well as its economic advantages. Trains transport more people at lower costs than other means of locomotion, and if you have to travel overnight you may be able to buy sleeping accommodations on the train at special prices unavailable at ticket offices.

There is much talk now about high-speed "bullet" trains, the kind I experienced in Japan. They travel at greater speeds than automobiles; and with less hassle at the train station than at an airport, middle distances may prove to be the preferred target of this new development.

In any case, I am a committed supporter of public transit. Canada was held together by rail transportation in its early days, and if it is not too late for people like me to rediscover the charm and possibility of train travel, maybe it is not too late for the country either.

Oh yes, as on planes, first class travel is more luxurious. But I for one found ordinary seats in smoke-free wagons a pleasurable way to go from here to there. I think I will try it again.

Fate of Israel's Druze intertwined with state

By CARL ALPERT

There are over one million Druze in the world today, most of them living in Lebanon and Syria. About 80,000 reside in Israel. Though their language is Arabic, they firmly insist they are not Arabs, and keep their identity quite separate.

Neither are they Muslims. They are identifiable as a separate ethnic group which, about a thousand years ago, developed a religion which may have been an offshoot of Islam, but is quite unlike it today. Their faith is kept a close secret, and details are known only to the inner circle. It is purely monotheistic. One principle of their beliefs is the sanctity of the truth, unless survival is at stake. Hospitality is a genuine mitzvah with them, not just an expression of politeness.

Druze believe in reincarnation. When one dies the spirit enters the body of a new-born. Since one cannot be converted to the Druze religion, their numbers increase slowly.

A revealing survey of the status of the Druze in Israel was presented at Haifa University not long ago with the participation of both Jewish and Druze Israelis. Prof. Yosef Ginat, head of the Jewish-Arab Centre at the university, made it clear at the outset that, though the venue was academic and the level would be scholarly, the discussion would not confine itself to abstract or historic matters but would deal with what is known in Hebrew as "actualia."

Participants included a Druze member of the Knesset, a Druze general in the army, a cadi (mayor) of a Druze town, a Druze university lecturer and others. The locale was appropriate, for Haifa University has more Druze students than any other university in Israel.

The traditional kiss of greeting between two Druze. [IPPA photo]

There were indeed many problems presented, and at times emotions ran high as Druze spokesmen gave vent to their frustrations and disappointments. Among the subjects discussed was military service. Druze youth have been subject to compulsory military service since 1956, but were angry that, despite this apparent recognition of equality, they were for many years kept in separate Druze units. It has only been in the last few years that they have also been afforded an opportunity to serve in mixed units with Jewish soldiers. This has enabled the two groups to become better acquainted, for as one participant in the seminar noted, soldiers who sleep in the same tents together for eight months or more, truly get to know each other.

The Druze economy was once purely agricultural, but more and more Druze men now find employment away from their villages, largely in defence-related occupations, ranging from the regular army and border guards to the prison service. Some concern was expressed as to what would happen to them if true peace came, the military was reduced, and their services were no longer required to the same degree.

Druze soldiers who return to their villages after completing their tour of duty do not get the same help as Jewish ex-servicemen, it was charged. They see vast amounts being spent by the government for the absorption of new immigrants in development towns, while Druze villages struggle along with inadequate funds.

Another complaint was that government personnel assigned to serve their villages, including teachers, school principals and even clerks handling contacts with government bodies, are not always of top calibre.

Changing circumstances are also creating problems. The rural complexion of Druze life is changing. How can they keep their youth down on the farm after their army service and after they have seen Tel Aviv?

Druze women, who under their faith have a remarkable degree of equality, are now also being exposed to the outside world through TV and the press. More and more women are also taking up outside employment as an economic necessity, and their patterns of life are affected accordingly.

Throughout the flow of complaints there was never a hint of disloyalty. On the contrary, their tune was that precisely because they feel themselves an integral part of the state, their disappointment is the greater at the raw deal they feel they are getting.

To tourists, the Druze are a friendly, exotic part of the landscape. To the military, they are a loyal, fearless and reliable element. Undoubtedly more attention should be given to meeting their needs and helping them attain a higher standard of living. Israel owes it to them to treat the Druze as full equals, but also to recognize they have their own dignity, their own history and culture. They are a people whose fate, at least here, is intertwined with that of the state. Their situation is not made any easier by the fact that all of them have close ties with kinsmen in Lebanon and Syria.

February — the month dedicated to love

By JACK CHISVIN

Some time ago, prior to the initial occupancy of the Jewish Home for the Aged, the residents were assembled for a briefing, to prepare them for the trauma associated with moving from an older building to a modern high rise structure.

Jack Chisvin

Because it was presumed that I was fluent in Yiddish, the lingua franca of most of the residents, I was invited to participate in the assembly to explain the technology of the building in terms that they would understand. How do you translate "an automatically controlled thermal environment?" — Sie vill nit kenen offen da vinda. Without doubt, I created more confusion than understanding.

During the question period, one gentleman asked why March 17 was picked as the moving date. The late Walter Lyons, executive director of the Home, chair of the briefing, replied with his usual good humor, "To celebrate St. Patrick's day," to which the gentleman quipped, "I didn't know that St. Patrick was Jewish."

Saints may not be part of the Jewish tradition, but sooner or later, in our secular existence we all cross paths with saints. I make a public confession that there was a time when I actually worshipped a saint — a non-sectarian saint, but a saint nevertheless — Saint Valentine.

Most people would probably pick February as the month they could best do without. My own choice would be November, a month without virtue. In November many living things wind down or vanish. Its dark, damp, joyless days must be endured until we are ensconced in the lights of Chanukah and distracted by the time warp that inevitably happens at the end of the year.

February, on the other hand, has a lot going for it. It is of course the shortest month of the year and because there is less of it, it runs its course the quickest. It is the month in which I finally remember to insert the correct year on my cheques and correspondence. Since it is symmetrical, containing precisely four weeks (except for leap year), I can guess with some certainty the day on which a specific date in March will fall. In February the days become visibly longer, exposing the backside of winter, and skiing is at its best. But most important, it is the month of Valentine's Day and love.

The elementary school I attended engaged only female teachers. At the beginning of each school year it was my fate to fall hopelessly and shamelessly in love with my teacher. Day after agonizing day I would sit in class trying to somehow discreetly signal my affection and command her attention. Days dragged into weeks and weeks into months, yet my love remained unrequited, until February arrived and we exchanged valentine cards with the teacher and I could pour it all out. The valentines which I designed, composed and constructed were pure inspiration — sensuous and revealing. It was as if I apprenticed at the knee of King Solomon as he was writing his love song. If the card which I received in return revealed less passion than I had hoped for, at least she was no longer unaware of my love for her.

It wasn't until I reached junior high school and encountered a male teacher that my succession of love affairs with teachers was broken. I learned that love is not a crush on the teacher nor the sentimental nonsense of Valentine's Day, that the experience of love includes much more. I began to understand that love brings all levels of the human being into play, intuition, emotions, and logic of mind, as well as sentiment of heart.

The Bible is replete with love stories, beginning with Adam and Eve, and since then much has been written about it. My favorite, a beautiful story exploring the many facets of love is Paul Gallico's The Snow Goose. It tells a haunting tale, simple and moving, of how a disfigured man's lasting love for nature, for country and for a woman was imperishable, surviving his brutal and senseless destruction by the inhumanity of war. Although written many years ago it remains a timely story.

I read a quote from a poet that "love is a process, delicate, violent, often terrifying." Somerset Maugham wrote that the line between love and hate is as thin as a razor's edge. But unlike hate, love is an inner private emotion and we are often more anxious to hide our love than our hatred. Yet it is love that brings to life whatever is dying around us — it is a regenerative force. Everyone has at some time sought that fanciful day when, as in the Garden of Eden, they hope to find love free and without care. But that day never comes because love is never free; it must be earned. Whenever I have occasion to revisit the Jewish Home for the Aged, I am reminded in many ways how rewarding love can be for those who have earned it.

Kol Israel's unlikely correspondent

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Curled up on his bed, a telephone receiver held to one ear, Dmitri Prokofiev was breathlessly dictating his latest report to Kol Israel in Jerusalem.

His Hebrew was fluent, assured and idiomatic, as befits an Israel Radio correspondent. But Kol Israel's man in Moscow is neither an Israeli nor a Jew. He is a Russian who once beamed anti-Israeli broadcasts to Israel.

Prokofiev, 42, has been a Kol Israel reporter since 1990. Before his appointment, he was a researcher for the Central Committee of the Soviet Communist party and a translator/broadcaster for Radio Moscow's Hebrew service.

A philologist by training, Prokofiev is also one of the editors of a new Russian-Hebrew, Hebrew-Russian dictionary jointly published by Israeli and Russian publishers.

The son of a Moscow State University history professor, he began studying Hebrew in 1973 after learning Arabic in a Middle East studies program. Hebrew attracted him for two reasons. There was already a surfeit of Arabic speakers in Moscow, given the Soviet Union's extensive ties with Arab regimes. And Prokofiev's curiosity was piqued by Israel, the butt of Soviet propaganda barrages.

He mastered Hebrew independently, buttressing his vocabulary and refining his accent by listening to Kol Israel's overseas channel. By the early 1980s, he was proficient in Hebrew.

In the meantime, he earned a living as a researcher for the Central Committee, translating articles in the Egyptian press and writing analyses. These were passed on to the KGB and other government agencies.

When his knowledge of Hebrew became known, Prokofiev was assigned to the Israeli press.

All the while, he continued his academic studies. Prokofiev's field, esoteric though it may have been in Moscow, was 20th century Hebrew theatre, a subject in which he holds a doctorate degree. "I fell in love with modern Israeli writers and poets, Amos Oz, Yehuda Amichai, A.B. Yeshoshua, Uri Greenberg," he said.

In 1982, he joined Radio Moscow as a Hebrew translator and broadcaster, replacing an Israeli woman — a communist — who had been on staff for years. More often than not, Radio Moscow's broadcasts were anti-Israel. "That was the line of Soviet propaganda," said Prokofiev, who belonged to the Communist party from 1977 until 1989.

He joined the party to advance his career. "I never believed in communism," he said. Nor, he added, was he ever personally hostile to Israel. "I was pro-Israel from the Six Day War. Before, I didn't know of Israel's existence."

While working at Radio Moscow, Prokofiev honed his Hebrew by serving as an interpreter for left-wing Israeli political delegations visiting Moscow. The Soviet Union severed diplomatic relations with Israel during the 1967 Six Day War and did not fully renew them until 1991.

As a result of his work at Radio Moscow, Prokofiev came to the attention of Kol Israel's Russian department. In 1990, he began sending Kol Israel Russian-language reports on Jewish affairs and Israeli personalities passing through the Soviet Union.

Shortly afterward, he was sacked by Radio Moscow because he had transmitted a report on Boris Yeltsin to Kol Israel and Radio Liberty that Radio Moscow had rejected.

After the 1991 Gulf War, Prokofiev started to submit regular reports, in Hebrew, to Kol Israel. Today, he files six dispatches per week, each four to five minutes in length. They usually deal with the political and economic situation in Russia and the rest of the former Soviet Union. He was particularly busy during the constitutional crisis in Moscow in September and October.

In addition to his work for Israel Radio, Prokofiev freelances for a Tel Aviv daily, Ha'aretz. (He wrote for Hadashot, another Israeli newspaper, until its demise last December.)

Prokofiev's involvement in the Russian-Hebrew, Hebrew-Russian dictionary stems from a meeting in 1990 with Israeli publisher Amos Rolnik in Moscow. The Soviet Union published a Hebrew-Russian dictionary in 1963, but it was long out of print by the late 1980s, when Soviet aliyah on a massive scale got under way.

Rolnik, sensing a captive market, rushed to fill the gap. The dictionary has done well, having sold 70,000 copies in Israel.

Prokofiev visited Israel for the first time in April 1992 on a promotional trip. He returned again in December of that year. He liked the country. "I felt at home, especially in Tel Aviv and the Galilee."

Prokofiev's second wife, Natasha, who's of Russian and Armenian ancestry, accompanied him to Israel. A blonde, bouncy, ebullient woman, Natashsa translates Hebrew prose and poetry into Russian. Her translation of Yehuda Sobol's play, A Jewish Soul, was staged in Moscow about two years ago.

Natasha's Hebrew teacher was Prokofiev. Why was she drawn to Hebrew, her only foreign tongue? "Because it seemed so interesting." She obviously values Hebrew.

While I waited for her husband to finish his broadcast, Natasha, sporting a necklace with a Star of David motif, chatted happily in Hebrew, and spontaneously broke into a Hebrew song by Nomi Shemer.

The whole family is Hebrew-oriented. Nina, Prokofiev's 16-year-old daughter from a previous marriage, is currently studying Hebrew. Her teacher? Prokofiev, of course.

The Prokofievs live modestly, in a typically tiny flat in southwestern Moscow. Prokofiev's office is in his crowded library. On one shelf was a dog-eared weekend edition of Yediot Achronot, the Israeli daily. Close by was a photograph showing Prokofiev with Simcha Dinitz, the chairman of the Jewish Agency.

A harried man ruled by constant deadlines, Prokofiev still finds time for projects outside the bounds of journalism. He has translated a Hebrew text about the first and second aliyah into Russian. And now he is working on a book, in Hebrew, about anti-Semitism in the Soviet Union during perestroika (1985-1991).

Mideast Analysis

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Israel is a Jewish state, but not all its citizens are Jewish. Indeed, almost one-fifth of Israelis are Arabs, whether they be Muslims, Christians or Druze.

It's probably fair to say that their status and their problems as a significant minority are underplayed in North America's Anglo-Jewish press. To the vast majority of readers, the Arab sector is simply terra incognita.

But if you read David Grossman's Conversations with Palestinians in Israel: Sleeping on a Wire (Farrar, Straus and Giroux, $22 U.S.) and Michael Gorkin's Days of Honey, Days of Onion: The Story of a Palestinian Family in Israel (University of California Press, no price listed), your understanding and appreciation of Israeli Arabs is bound to increase.

Grossman, a respected journalist and author, compares Israeli Arabs to an acrobat who stands still on a tightrope. As he succinctly puts it: "He has come to terms with Israel's existence but still does not feel part of it."

Citing official government statistics, Grossman maintains that the typical Arab in Israel faces a host of inequities.

Arab villages receive 6 percent of development funds available to rural local authorities, although they represent 30 percent of the population in such settlements. The water allocated for Arab agriculture is proportionately far less than that given to Jewish farmers. The ministry of labor and welfare has established only one institution for developmentally disabled Arab children. In the ministry of justice, only three out of 1,000 employees are Arabs. Fifty five percent of Israeli families below the poverty line are Arabs.

Arabs, Grossman writes, feel there are definite limits to their advancement. As an Arab teacher and a writer tells her pupils, "There are things that you can never be in Israel. Not a member of the cabinet or director-general of a ministry or a pilot, nothing that is really important to Israeli society."

The Arabs of Israel

Elsewhere, an Arab physician observes that Israeli Arabs find themselves between citizenship and subjection. "The doors are only half open to them in all areas of life, and there are areas in which the gaps are getting larger."

If Israel does not do more to ameliorate the lot of Israeli Arabs, Grossman warns, there could be trouble. "...Israel is missing its chance to rescue itself from a horrible mistake. It is creating for itself the enemy it will run up against after its other enemies have made their peace with it."

In Days of Honey, Days of Onion, Gorkin — a clinical psychologist — draws a profile of the Abu Ahmad family of Kufr Qara, a Muslim village of 9,000 inhabitants east of Caesarea. Under the 1947 UN Palestine partition plan, Kufr Qara was allotted to the Palestinian state. But as part of Jordan's armistice agreement with Israel in 1949, Kufr Qara and 14 other Arab villages were turned over to Israel.

The Abu Ahmads comprise three generations: Abu Ahmad and his wife, Umm; their nine children; and their 26 grandchildren. Abu Ahmad is a retired farmer of 70 who lost the bulk of his land during the 1948 Arab-Israeli war. As a pragmatist, he has made his peace with Israel.

Gorkin draws a fascinating portrait of life in an Arab village. He describes the routines and trials of Arab farmers like Abu Ahmad and his son, Hassan. He elaborates on Arab customs, folkways and traditions, as well as Arab resentments. And his chapter of a mixed marriage, involving a Muslim doctor and a Jewish woman from Argentina, is a case study of assimilation.

Like Grossman, Gorkin is acutely aware of the discrimination Israeli Arabs face. Hassan recalls a humiliating incident in a men's store in Hadera, while Abu Ahmad speaks of the censorship in schools that prevailed when Arab villages were under military rule until 1966.

"Our children were made to study subjects as if they were Jews. They hardly learned anything about Arab history and literature... They were not even taught that they were Palestinians. It was forbidden to even use the word Palestine in class."

The situation has improved since then. But, judging by these illuminating books under review, Israeli Arabs still have a long way to go.

Chassidim flock to Uman

By JED SUNDEN

Following a tradition that dates back to the beginning of the last century, thousands of Chassidic pilgrims made their way to Uman, the small Ukrainian city lying halfway between Kiev and Odessa, to visit the grave of Rabbi Nachman of Bratslav during Rosh Hashanah.

Uman today looks like a typical post-Soviet-era city. The square in the centre of town still has a huge statue of Lenin, alongside of which dozens of private entrepreneurs sell produce or consumer products brought over the border from Poland. On the outskirts of Uman, factories, smokestacks and rows of gray Soviet-style apartment buildings are piled next to old, little cottages.

If it were not for the grave of Rabbi Nachman of Bratslav and the thousands of Jews who have come to his grave wearing their best black hats and caftans, there would be nothing to distinguish Uman from the hundreds of other small Ukrainian cities.

Born in 1772, Rabbi Nachman became famous for his teachings and mystical interpretations of Jewish texts. A great-grandson of Rabbi Israel Baal Shem Tov, the founder of Chassidism, Rabbi Nachman emerged as one of the leading figures of the burgeoning Chassidic movement.

Suffering from tuberculosis, Rabbi Nachman moved to Uman to be near the mass grave of the Jews of Uman, who were forced to choose between conversion or death during the Chmielnicki revolt and massacres of 1648-49.

According to his wishes, when he died, Rabbi Nachman was buried amid the 20,000 martyrs of the Haidamak persecutions in the 18th century, which were more limited in scope than the Chmielnicki massacres, but even more terrible in their cruelty.

On his death bed, he promised his followers that he would personally intercede on behalf of anyone who visited him, saying that he would lift them out of hell by their peyos (earlocks). Since then, his followers have returned to Uman every year on Rosh Hashanah to pray, sing and dance at his grave.

He remains the only leader, or rebbe, that the Bratslav Chassidim have ever had. After the Russian revolution, the Communist government tried to stop the gatherings by forbidding Jews from Poland to enter the country and by closing in 1937 the last synagogue in the city, turning it into a metalworks factory. During World War II, Uman and its graveyard became the scene of intensive fighting between the Soviet and German armies.

Returning to the site after the war, the Jews of Uman discovered the cemetery had been devastated and the gravesite had been demolished by a hand grenade. Soon after the war, the Soviet government announced plans to build housing units on the site.

The sole remaining Bratslav Chasid living in Uman, a convert to Judaism named Reb Daniel, quickly bought the land. The precise site of the grave was found, and Reb Daniel built a house near it. The wall of the house was placed flush against the grave with a window above it to prevent extensions and insure that nothing else would ever be built over the site, thus protecting the sanctity of the grave.

Before he left for Israel, Reb Daniel sold the house to Yakob, a now-elderly Ukrainian who still lives there today. Though the site was preserved, the grave remained off limits to Jews. It was not until 1988 that the Soviet government, then experiencing the first awakenings of perestroika, allowed the first group of 250 Jews to visit the grave.

Since then, the number of Jews visiting the site has grown every year. Air Ukraine has added extra flights on its Kiev-New York route for what is known as "Uman week," and dozens of charters come in from Israel.

Many local residents are able to make the equivalent of several months' salary during the course of the week. This year, the main kitchen had over 100 Israelis as well as 20 Ukrainians working there preparing kosher meals. In contrast to past years, most of the food was not flown in from Israel but came from Ukraine. A shochet, or ritual slaughterer, had been slaughtering meat for a month in advance.

Perhaps most impressively, an entire synagogue — the first to be built in Ukraine since before the Bolshevik Revolution — was put up in just three-and-a-half weeks by a local contracting company working overtime. In addition, several mikvahs, or ritual baths, were built and were operating during the week. — (JTA)

Israel Bonds Women report banner year

Hamilton group third strongest in Canada

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — Hamilton's Bonds women's division is the third strongest in Canada, Israel Bonds executive vice-president told a small group of women here.

Charles Diamond said 1993 was the best ever for Hamilton Bond sales, putting the city ahead of Toronto and Vancouver. Only Montreal and Ottawa had greater sales.

It was another feather in the cap for the organization's hard working executive and members, who gathered at Adas Israel Synagogue one recent morning to pay tribute to outgoing co-chairs Sylvia Klein and Cheryl Greenbaum. Klein and Greenbaum are mother and daughter.

After a brief review of the year's highlights, Greenbaum paid tribute to Bonds office manager Barbara Balonjan and introduced incoming chair Stephanie McLean, one of the Hamilton women's division "ever-widening circle of friends that we can count on."

A woman's division member for many years, McLean said she looks forward to the many challenges ahead and is satisfied with the women's division progress.

The women's division has become very visible and its events "are definitely on the calendar," she said.

Klein meanwhile promised to continue "to do anything you want me to, go in the kitchen, peel potatoes...

"You're not going to put me out to pasture yet," she said amid laughter.

Diamond thanked campaign chair Al Rams for a job well done. Last year was the best ever for Bonds throughout Canada.

This year's goal, he said, is to raise $2 billion. He wants to introduce women to the women's division and encourage them to buy units, especially at Pesach time.

Diamond presented Klein and Greenbaum with the Israel Bonds Absorption Award, while Balonjan distributed photograph albums from last year's gala luncheon to honorees Pearl Enkin, Sandra Fuss, Marcia Halpren and Rita Shapiro.

Young Judaea revived in Atlantic Canada

By JOEL JACOBSON
CJN Maritimes Correspondent

HALIFAX — After too long a hiatus, Young Judaea programming is being revived in Atlantic Canada.

With last September's arrival of Gali Salamon, a 24-year-old shaliach from Israel, Jews in Eastern Canada hoped for renewed interest in Jewish issues and Jewish programming among the young. And so far, they have not been disappointed.

"I've had good reaction from parents," said Salamon. "Some of them even called me after programs and told me the kids enjoyed them and said their children asked when the next program would be."

The young people, ages six to 18, have also expressed enthusiasm.

"At the beginning in Halifax, we had five or six kids for each program, but the last time [in January], we had 15 for each group," Salamon said. "And they were all asking for the date of the next program. For me, that is a big accomplishment, if the kids ask when is the next program before they leave the room. It is encouraging."

So far, the renewed Young Judaea program has been strongest in Halifax, because Gali is based in the region's largest Jewish community.

But her trips to Moncton, Fredericton, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland are also expected to be fruitful.

"When I went to Moncton for the first time, I told them (madrichim) what was expected when I'm not here. But if they don't get full support from me as their guide, there is difficulty getting programs going. Most of the leaders went to Camp Kadimah and have gone through the counsellor-in-training program and this will help them lead. I do the research, prepare information, and present it to the leaders to give to the kids. Then I give them the responsibility to do programs with the younger age groups."

Early programming is on the establishment of the State of Israel and on the life of David Ben Gurion. Salamon is preparing light, interesting and enjoyable programs for the smaller children, to hold their attention. She said the 10- and 11-year-olds are enthusiastic and want to learn more.

"The 12- to 14-year-olds are at a tough age," she said. "They don't want to be involved. They are very busy with their own lives. We tried to do something light and without commitment and didn't get a good turnout. Attracting them will be a big challenge for me."

School year request made

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — British Columbia school boards have been asked to make "a special effort" to accommodate Jewish students and teachers who will likely skip the first two days of the new school year because they fall on Rosh Hashanah.

The request has been made by letter from the Canadian Jewish Congress, Pacific region, to provincial Minister of Education Art Charbonneau.

A similar request has been made to Dan Miller, the minister of skills and training, whose ministry covers universities and vocational schools.

"This clash of dates will place many of your students, faculty and staff in the distressing situation of trying to deal with the needs of their faith and their obligation to the university or college," says the letter to Miller. "We urge you to make flexible arrangements for those who will be absent."

The letter to Charbonneau asks that school boards make a special effort to accommodate students starting elementary or high school. "The first two days are vital to such students' orientation in a new educational environment."

Congress has enclosed a schedule of Jewish holidays up to the year 2000.

Community seeks action on defaced cemetery

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special To The CJN

TORONTO — "There was a breakdown in communications."

With these words, cemetery custodian Benjamin Hamburger acknowledged he was not aware that swastikas daubed on the outside wall of the Jones Avenue cemetery during the 1992 High Holidays were still visible months later.

"In future, I'll see that our staff are more vigilant in doing the work immediately after such an occurrence," Hamburger assured a gathering of about 25 concerned citizens assembled in a Riverdale public school to discuss the problem.

Dr. Philip Berger, who organized the meeting, said the cemetery caretaker had immediately covered the original black swastikas with white paint, but in such a way that the shapes were plainly visible.

Berger described his increasing frustration at trying to find an official within the Jewish community to repaint the wall. Finally, three months and one broken promise later, he and some friends "went like teenagers" to the cemetery with a bucket of paint and obscured the white images.

"If the Jews can't respect their own cemetery, how do you expect anyone else to do it?" asked Berger. "If this happened in Richmond Hill, I can't believe that the community would tolerate bright white swastikas for three months."

He suggested Jewish community officials had been slow to act because of Riverdale's sparse Jewish population, which he estimated at 500.

Tucked away behind an old wall in Toronto's east end, the cemetery on Jones Avenue was established as the city's second Jewish burial ground in 1883. Like its older counterpart on Pape Avenue, which dates from 1849, the Jones Avenue site may be particularly vulnerable to attack because of the many neo-Nazis who live in the neighborhood.

Barbed wire installed

In recent years the caretaker at Pape has installed barbed wire around the perimeter fence to discourage malicious intruders.

Bernie Farber, national director of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress, said followers of Holocaust denier Ernst Zundel and Heritage Front leader Wolfgang Droege may have been responsible.

"The vandalism is not being done by the adults. They give messages which lead their young followers to do this kind of thing. They're trying to strike fear in the heart of the Jewish community.

"But this kind of episode doesn't scare the Jewish community. We're not an easily frightened community. What it does is, it makes us angry."

Police Const. Kevin Grant of 55 Division recalled that he was walking his Riverdale beat when a lady told him of the graffiti. "There were slogans painted in black spray paint," he told the gathering. "I thought, 'Wow, this is pretty bad.' Certain things were sprayed on the wall that I'm not even going to repeat in this meeting here."

Hamburger, general manager of the Amalgamated Dawes Road Trustees, told the assembly that his office was responsible for maintenance at Jones Avenue, which still receives two or three burials each year. He said the cemetery is owned by two parties, the Beth Tzedek Synagogue and the (Toronto) Chevra Kadisha (Burial Society).

He denied Riverdale was less of a priority since it was geographically out of the mainstream of the Jewish community. "At Roselawn cemetery, there's still more than 100 monuments on the ground from an act of vandalism years ago," he said.

Members of the audience were vociferous in their conviction that Jewish communal authorities were not living up to their responsibilities. "Beth Tzedek should be ashamed," declared Berger, saying he found it "an embarrassment as a Jew to drive down Jones Avenue."

Other persons delivered similar messages. "As a property manager," said one, "I know that to discourage vandalism you cover over the graffiti as soon as it happens, and you keep doing it until the vandals get discouraged."

"The problem of swastikas is not something that can be tolerated," said another. "If swastikas or the remains of swastikas are permitted to linger, then that's a victory for the Nazis. It's a question of whether we're going to allow Nazis to flourish in this city or whether we're going to stomp them out now."

Hate crimes reported

Cotgreave said that prior reports referred to "anti-Semitic" incidents and that the prefix "anti" was dropped for the current report. He said future reports will use the word Jews or Jewish.

Asked why only one of the 10 reported incidents of hate propaganda has led to criminal charges, Cotgreave said some were still being investigated, while there may be no suspect in other cases. Police may have found in other incidents that the materials were not illegal under the Criminal Code, he added.

Meanwhile, Farber renewed his call for a "dedicated unit" whose sole task is countering hate crimes. While the report was "a good first effort. . . the reason the report is so weak is that it's a part-time report from a part-time unit," he said.

The League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada, which has been compiling statistics on reports of anti-Semitic incidents in Canada for over 12 years, expressed its support for the continued gathering of hate crimes statistics and the strengthening of the Hate Crimes Unit of the Metro Police Force.

"Long-term trends cannot be established from one year of record-keeping, yet this is an important first step in Metro's ongoing commitment to combatting hate," said Rochelle Winter, Ontario chair of the League.

Ben Nobleman devoted 25 years to York politics

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Ben Nobleman, for 25 years an alderman in the City of York, died last week at Mount Sinai Hospital after suffering a second stroke. He was 69.

Phil White, former mayor of the City of York and a long-time political colleague, described Nobleman as a unique individual.

"Few, if any, aldermen have given as much of themselves. He was always there for his constituents, helping and supporting them."

Outspoken and forthright, according to White, "he believed in every word he said."

Nobleman was the catalyst for legislation being passed to give a modest pension to municipal politicians, White said. "He walked where others feared to tread."

He was known for always having a joke to tell. "And he laughed louder than anyone else at his own jokes."

Nobleman's wife, Norma, said that her husband "fell into politics, because he liked to do things for people. He was a crusader."

He fought for causes he held dear, she explained, such as the need to have Canadian talent at the Canadian National Exhibition, and he founded the Society for Recognition of Canadian Talent. He believed that able-bodied people on welfare should be put to work helping the disabled and the elderly.

Ben Nobleman

An alderman from 1966-1991, he "loved a good fight," Norma Nobleman said, adding that "he always fought fair and hard."

He "considered himself an ombudsman," she said. "He was always getting phone calls from constituents, and he helped them as best he could."

Nobleman was born in Russia, son of a Hebrew teacher.

His father, Moishe, came to Niagara Falls, where he was a teacher and general clergyman, even performing marriages, Norma Nobleman said.

The family soon came to be with him. Later, the Noblemans moved to Toronto, where Moishe Nobleman was a teacher at Eitz Chaim Schools.

Ben Nobleman maintained a tie with Eitz Chaim, and for many years presented an award to a member of the graduating class.

He was active in other Jewish organizations as well, including B'nai Brith Upper Canada Lodge and League for Human Rights. He was on the executive and council of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, as well as the region's world Jewry and international affairs and Israel affairs committees.

From 1979 to 1984 he was on the executive committee of what was then Toronto Jewish Congress.

He was known for his love of the entertainment world, White calling him a "frustrated actor" and wife Norma remembering how he always wanted to attend Lorne Greene's acting school when it was in Toronto.

Involved in public relations before entering politics (he handled publicity for a visit here by Coretta Scott King shortly after the murder of her civil rights husband), he especially enjoyed working with show business celebrities, such as Danny Kaye and Elvis Presley.

He had some minor acting roles, including Wojeck and Quentin Durgens and was a long-time member of ACTRA.

One of the joys of his life was having a parkette on Eglinton Ave. W. named after him, Norma Nobleman said.

Nobleman is survived by his wife Norma and son Mark.

Nurturing children's identity said responsibility of women

By JOEL JACOBSON
CJN Maritimes Correspondent

HALIFAX — While juggling work and other family obligations, Jewish women have the added burden of nurturing Jewish identity in their children, something many Jewish males fail to understand, a sociologist told a Halifax conference recently.

Speaking to about 15 university students, Prof. Sheva Medjuck, professor of sociology and anthropology at Mount St. Vincent University in Halifax, and a vice president of the Atlantic Jewish Council, said men's roles have changed dramatically compared to earlier generations.

"In the early part of this century, men were expected to educate the children. Not any more. When you talk of continuity, you talk of the importance of the family; yet the family is geared to the woman's leadership. Men don't take part.

"As the woman's role in the work force increases in responsibility, why don't men take a greater role in Jewish continuity?"

Medjuck said men and women have to question the Jewish establishment about women's issues. "I'm cautiously optimistic that as long as we convey the struggle to younger women, a solution will be found.

"But if that doesn't occur, we'll lose very fine, well-educated young women as they get tired of Judaism not speaking to the reality of their lives."

The conference, Young Women and Judaism, was the first of three being sponsored nationally by the Jewish Students' Network Canada. The Halifax session was co-ordinated by the Atlantic Jewish Council.

"The attendance was a bit disappointing," said Gali Salamon, Atlantic Canada shaliach. "We expected between 20 and 30 young women but many students said they were not interested in feminism issues."

The students who did attend, she said, "told me they were happy they came and they learned a lot."

The program also included a discussion on Women and Judaism led by Andrea Silverstone of Toronto, national chair of Network, and Natalie Blitt of Montreal, gender issues officer for Network.

Devorah Grafstein, wife of new Halifax orthodox rabbi, Shlomo Grafstein, spoke about women and spirituality.

CJC region, Federation send aid to Sarajevo, Soviets

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For the third time in the past year, Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, and the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto have coordinated a campaign to send pharmaceuticals and clothing to those in need in Sarajevo and the former Soviet Union.

Articles valued at about $50,000 were dispatched recently to Eastern Europe following a two-month-long effort to "put it all together," said Daniel Fine, a staff associate at Congress. The response to the joint project was "surprisingly swift and wonderfully generous," said Gerda Frieberg, Ontario chair of Congress and federation president Bernard Ghert.

The pharmaceuticals have already arrived in the Croatian coastal city of Split, en route to Sarajevo, Fine said, while the clothing is destined for St. Petersburg, Russia.

Both will be allocated under the auspices of the Joint Distribution Committee (JDC) to anyone in need, he said.

The articles collected include women's coats and boots, winter socks, thermal underwear, cartons of clothing as well as stocks of medicine.

A number of corporations contributed to the relief effort, including Town Shoes, Cotton Casuals, Design One, McGregor Hosiery, Mac Mor Sportswear, Grand National Trousers, Dylex, Budd's Department Store, Arthur's Bargain Centre, ICZ International, Novopharm and Apotex.

A number of synagogues also participated in the project, including Beth Tzedec, Darchei Noam, Kehillat Shaarei Torah, Shaarei Haim, Shaarei Tefillah, Solel Congregation and Temple Har Zion.

Because of export regulations, all the clothing sent abroad was new, meaning that congregation members had to purchase the garments and could not send along second-hand materials, Fine said.

"From the start, the community and individuals at large had a sense of helplessness" when viewing events unfold in Eastern Europe, he said. While "they felt they couldn't change the situation to help the innocents, they believed that this is a tangible way for the Jewish community to help those in need who are suffering there."

About 300 to 350 Jews remain in Sarajevo, the besieged Bosnian capital. Most of them are elderly and unable to leave. On Feb. 6, the JDC organized a rescue mision to evacuate several hundred men, women and children — Jews and non-Jews alike — after a mortar attack killed 65 in the city's market area.

About People

LIGHT COOKING

Rose Reisman Brings Home Light Cooking, written by Rose Reisman and published by MacMillan Canada, was a major fundraising project for the Canadian Breast Cancer Foundation and thanks to the generous support of the public, the Foundation has raised over $170,000 through the sales of the cookbook.

Reisman is a self-published Canadian cookbook author, whose trademark is the ability to create delicious recipes, low in cholesterol, sugar and fats. In this cookbook, recipes are complemented by nutritional analyses, advice on healthy cooking and eating and recommendations on food substitutes, special equipment and cooking techniques.

Known for her promotions at women's clubs, book clubs and charitable fundraisers, Reisman is associated with the Women's Legal Education and Action Fund (LEAF) as a contributor to its cookbook, Just the Best. She holds Master of Fine Arts and Master of Business Administration degrees from York University.

Hamantaschen — a Purim treat

By LESLIE MICHLIN BORDEN
Special to The CJN

Hamantaschen, triangle shaped fruit-filled cookies, are traditionally served for Purim. They fulfill the holiday's admonition to mock Haman, the villain who wanted to murder all the Jews in the town of Shushan, in ancient Persia, since they are shaped like his three-cornered hat.

In East Europe, hamantaschen were considered special treats, shared with friends and family as Shlach Mones. They were also supposed to help use up all the flour in time for Passover, four weeks later.

Hamantaschen are filled with poppy seeds, mohn in Yiddish, a pun on the sound of Haman's name. They also are filled with cooked prunes (lekvar), other dried fruits, and nuts in consideration of Queen Esther's vegetarianism when she lived at the court of King Ahasverus.

In the East European baking style, housewives made their pastries light by using either eggs or yeast. Once in the United States, Jewish housewives didn't have time to let yeast dough rise to make hamantaschen. Instead, they took advantage of baking powder. They began making hamantaschen from cookie doughs that used double-acting, fast-rising baking powder. But they filled their hamantaschen as they always had, with poppy seeds or cooked prunes.

As modern Jewish homemakers, we have the best of both worlds. We can prepare hamantaschen made from cookie dough, like our grandmothers did. We also can make the most traditional East European yeast dough hamantaschen without having to spend all day in the kitchen thanks to electric and electronic bread machines. All we have to do is put in the ingredients, set the machine on manual, wait for the beep, and come back and shape the dough just like our great-great-grandmothers did.

BREAD MACHINE HAMANTASCHEN DOUGH

1 packet yeast
4½ cups flour
1 tsp. salt
½ cup sugar
1 egg (or ¼ cup no-fat egg substitute)
½ cup margarine, cut in pieces
1½ cups milk, orange juice or water

Place all ingredients in machine. Set at "sweet bread" "manual." Let machine mix and raise the dough. After the beep, when the initial processes are complete, punch down. Shape and bake.

Enough dough for about 65 cookies.

HAMANTASCHEN FILLINGS

Poppyseed Filling (Mohn)

2 cups poppyseeds
1 cup orange juice or water
½ cup honey
¼ cup sugar
Dash salt
¼ cup sliced almonds
½ cup raisins
1 tbsp. grated orange or lemon rind

Combine poppyseeds, orange juice (or water), honey, sugar and salt in a saucepan. Cover and cook over moderate heat until thick, stirring occasionally to prevent scorching. When the mixture is thick, remove from heat. Place the cooked mixture and remaining ingredients in bowl of food processor. Process until smooth.

Makes 2 cups filling for about 60 cookies.

Prune Filling (Lekvar)

1½ lbs. pitted prunes
1 whole orange, sliced
Water to cover
½ cup sugar
1 tsp. cinnamon
½ cup almonds

Place prunes and orange slices in a medium saucepan. Cover with water. Bring to a boil and cook, covered, until the prunes are soft and the water has been absorbed. Remove from heat and cool.

Place sugar, cinnamon, and almonds in bowl of food processor and process long enough to chop the nuts coarsely. Add the cooled mixture. Continue processing until smooth.

Makes about 5 cups, enough to fill about 100 cookies.

Fast and Easy Uncooked Fruit Filling

1 lb. uncooked pitted prunes
½ cup chopped almonds
½ cup seedless raisins
¼ cup dried apricots
½ cup sugar
2 tsp. cinnamon
½ cup fresh lemon juice

Place all ingredients in food processor. Process until mixture becomes smooth and thick.

Makes about 4 cups, enough to fill about 80 cookies.

Prune Chocolate Filling

½ cup almonds
1 lb. uncooked pitted prunes
1 cup unsweetened cocoa
½ cup sugar
2 tsp. cinnamon
½ cup non-fat milk

In a small non-stick fry pan, toast the almonds over medium heat. Once the almonds start to brown, keep the pan moving so the nuts do not burn.

Place all ingredients in the bowl of your food processor. Process until smooth.

Makes about 3 cups, enough to fill about 60 cookies.

Jews for Judaism head outlines best defences against missionaries

By MARA KOVEN
CJN Correspondent

LONDON — The scenarios are troublesome.

Jewish children making candlesticks for Shabbat while wearing a hat printed with Yeshua (Jesus). A "rabbi" encouraging audiences to embrace Jesus. A haymishe band singing "I'm waiting for Yeshua."

But a strong Jewish identity is the key to resisting cults and missionaries, according to one expert.

Julius Ciss is the director of Jews for Judaism, a Toronto-based countermissionary group. He was in London recently to address an audience of Jewish teens as part of a co-operative program hosted by rabbis from the three streams of Judaism.

Ciss said the best defence against mind-control is developing a solid grounding in Jewish identity. Telling a Christian missionary " 'I love being Jewish' ... is the most difficult barrier for missionaries to overcome. Alternatively, assimilation has made the missionaries job much easier."

In discussing cults, Ciss estimated that there are 500 groups in Canada which control the minds of their members. He said cults like the Branch Davidians exist in smaller cities, and Hare Krishna followers now wear business suits instead of flowing saffron robes to appeal to new members.

On the topic of Hebrew-Christians, or Messianic Jews, Ciss said their numbers are growing. He said there are 36 missionary groups operating in southern Ontario, with a Missionary Church in London.

Missionaries target Jews on campuses, in school yards, Jewish neighborhoods, hospitals, nursing homes and malls, said Ciss.

He said Hebrew-Christians have targeted Jews based on their understanding of the Christian Bible's Book of Romans. If a Jews for Jesus missionary approaches, Ciss insisted "never enter into a dialogue with them. They are dedicated to their cause and have a lot of detailed information targeted to confuse you."

When asked what to do if a friend or relative becomes part of a missionary group, Ciss suggested maintaining the relationship because "it is relationships that have attracted them to the missionary group and relationships that may help in getting them out." He also suggested contacting Jews for Judaism for more information at (416) 789-2851.

CJC Pacific region urges Ottawa to fight racism, hate crimes

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — The head of the Canadian Jewish Congress Pacific region wants the federal government to "honor its commitment in the recent throne speech to enact more effective measures to combat racism and hate crime."

In a statement issued two weeks ago, Renee Switzer Bellas said Canadian Human Rights Comission prodecures don't work well enough.

She cited the case of the Canadian Liberty Net (CLN), which along with promoter Tony McAleer was found in breach of section 13 (1) of the Human Rights Act two years ago for broadcasting phone messages which fostered hatred and contempt for Jews, non-white immigrants and others.

The Human Rights tribunal ordered CLN to stop the phone messages but the order was appealed. Another tribunal recently ordered McAleer, CLN and associates "anywhere in Canada" to stop distributing phone messages exposing gays to hatred or contempt (CJN, Feb. 10). Switzer Bellas said she expects that decision will also be appealed.

Bellas said despite being found in breach of the Human Rights Act by two different tribunals, "the Canadian Liberty Net continues to broadcast.

"Racism is a growing concern in our society. Until the laws enacted to protect people from discrimination can do more than simply ask promoters of hatred and contempt to stop their activities, the government is not utilizing its power to encourage understanding and harmony between all Canadians, regardless of their race, sex, religion or sexual orientation."

Montreal businessman gets Maccabi post

Schwartz's fundraising savvy (he chaired Montreal's 1990 Operation Exodus and Combined Jewish Appeal) will be used on behalf of Maccabi Canada over the next four years as it gears up for the 1997 Maccabiah in Israel.

"As national fundraising chair I will help co-ordinate, and be supportive of each of our regional fundraising chairs," he says. "Each regional chair will be responsible for developing an energetic program that will raise the required dollars to go into the national pool."

In addition to traditional fundraising events and strategies, Schwartz hopes to receive more corporate support. To this end, Jonathan Wener of Canderel will set up the corporate sponsorship program.

All funds raised are used to cover expenses for the 1997 contingent of young athletes including travel, ground transportation, room and board, equipment, uniforms, medical supplies and administrative expenses.

Schwartz became involved with Maccabi Canada in 1975 when close friend and athlete Gary Ulrich approached him to help build the organization. "He sold me on my three greatest loves — kids, amateur sports and Israel," says Schwartz.

"Canada's participation in the Maccabiah Games not only heightens the feeling of Jewishness within our kids, but brings an incredible understanding of the strong ties that Jews of the Diaspora feel for Israel."

Holocaust Awareness Week held at Guelph

'Even though it's upsetting to remember, it is important that we do'

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Jewish Student Organization (JSO) at the University of Guelph put heart and soul into its first-ever Holocaust Awareness Week, an event which probably touched more non-Jewish students than Jewish ones.

"We wanted it to be an educational event for the entire community," said fourth-year student Russell Bondurianskey, who served on the organizing committee for the recent event.

A talk by Holocaust survivor Robert Engel drew well over 100 people, only about 30 of whom were thought to be Jewish. The program, originally scheduled to be held in a room with 40 seats, was hastily moved to an alternate location.

Engel told the students of his experiences as a child in Nazi Germany and his work for the Dutch underground before he was sent to a concentration camp. Engel advised the audience that they could prevent another Holocaust by refusing to put up with racism.

"You can be proud that you live here in a country that gave me my life," he concluded, referring to his liberation by Canadian soldiers in 1945. "If you have a grandfather who fought in the war, thank him for me. Give him a hug and say I haven't forgotten him."

Engel told The CJN he found the experience of speaking in Guelph "really heartwarming." His session ran overtime, reflecting the interest shown by students of varied backgrounds during a question-and-answer session following his talk.

"Even though it's upsetting to remember, it is important that we do," says JSO co-president Jordana Bester, a second-year student. "If you're not upset, if you don't let it affect you, the importance will be lost and God forbid something can happen again."

Other Holocaust Awareness Week events included a slide presentation on the March of the Living program by Michael Sobol, University of Guelph professor and JSO staff adviser; and a discussion group on current implications of the Holocaust. Visual displays were supplied by the Holocaust Remembrance Committee through the Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region's community services department, and by the Israeli consulate.

The week concluded with a memorial service at Beth Isaiah Synagogue. At one point the power went out, leaving six yahrzeit candles and the shul's Ner Tamid (eternal light) as the only light sources. "It struck me as quite symbolic," noted Bester's co-president Saul Cohen.

Cohen and Bester have been instrumental in revitalizing the JSO in the past year. Cohen, now in his third year at Guelph, was inspired to take an active role when he attended a Network Canada convention in December 1992. (Network is the Canadian arm of World Union of Jewish Students.)

On hearing about Jewish student activities on other campuses, Cohen decided that he would become involved in JSO instead of "just ignoring" it.

JSO activities have been stepped up this year, in comparison with recent years. In addition to twice-monthly lunches, many of which are tied in to Jewish holidays, the students have added weekly discussion groups and a Shabbaton to their agenda. Toronto educator Gary Levine spoke recently on Intermarriage, and Glen Eker of Guelph was scheduled to speak this week on Jewish genealogy.

The idea for Holocaust Awareness Week followed media reports of an American survey indicating that a high percentage of young people believed the Holocaust didn't happen.

Cohen and Bester downplayed any suggestion of anti-Semitism on the Guelph campus, where Jewish students number only 200 out of a total student population of 15,000. "I think everyone in the JSO has their stories of ignorant anti-Semitism," said Cohen. "There haven't really been any major incidents. No one has been in jeopardy."

Bester noted that problems of anti-Semitism have been, for the most part "anonymous things in the night," such as graffiti. "The majority of the university population is open and open-minded," she said.

Federation provides resource for new parents

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — With little fanfare, a fledgling, volunteer-run project of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto has provided a practical resource to the parents of over 400 newborns, since it was inaugurated last April.

If you live or shop along the Bathurst corridor, you may have seen a Welcome to Our World display inviting parents to send for a complimentary information kit. The display features the project's cheery logo — a teddy bear with an Israeli flag planted in one paw and a Canadian flag in the other.

The kit for parents includes a colorful plastic-backed terrycloth feeding bib with the Welcome to Our World logo, an attractive certificate welcoming the new baby to the Jewish community, and a guidebook of Jewish resources such as babysitting and day care. The guide also has information on Jewish ceremonies and holidays, as well as on the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto and its affiliate agencies.

"We find that even people who've lived in Toronto for a long time need this information," says Asya Vit, an employment counsellor at Jewish Vocational Service who staffs the Welcome to Our World project as a resource person. Vit is working toward her Master of Social Work degree at Yeshiva University's Wurzweiler School of Social Work; the Federation project is a field placement for her.

Welcome to Our World was modelled on a similar program run by Baltimore's Jewish Federation, Vit told The CJN. A second Canadian program is now running in Montreal.

"There was a definite understanding in the Jewish Federation that a lot of [Jewish] people are not involved in the Jewish community," Vit said. The birth of a baby provides a good opportunity for outreach, she believes. "That's where it starts. It's a crucial moment.

"Our goal is to educate the community about the Jewish Federation and to help them use the services that are available," Vit said.

Susan Fenwick, who chairs the Welcome to Our World committee, says that for her, "It's a real feel-good project.

"We are educating people and making them feel they are part of the Jewish community and that the Jewish community knows and cares about them." Fenwick has been actively involved in the Jewish community as a volunteer for the past dozen years.

Future plans for Welcome to Our World include a get-together for the new parents.

The project is funded by the Bequest and Endowment Fund of the United Jewish Welfare Fund of Toronto.

Parents of newborns who would like to obtain a kit should call (416) 635-2883, ext. 137 or write to Welcome to Our World, Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, 4600 Bathurst Street, Willowdale M2R 3V2.

First Negev Dinner planned for Kelowna

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

KELOWNA, B.C. — The first-ever Negev Dinner in Kelowna will be held on May 10 in the Capri Hotel, and will honor Cliff and Lois Serwa.

Proceeds of the dinner will go towards developing an Okanagan grove in the British Columbia Peace Forest in Israel. Guest speaker at the event will be Israel ambassador Itzhak Shelef.

Longtime MLA for Okanagan West, Cliff Serwa is the Social Credit House leader in the B.C. legislature and critic for the ministries of Education, Environment, Lands and Parks and Attorney-General. Members of the Jewish community regard him as very approachable, and have found him helpful in raising funds for the new Okanagan Jewish Community Centre in Kelowna.

Lois Serwa was Kelowna's Woman of the Year in 1989 and was nominated for the Royal Bank Citizen Award for Canada in 1992. She is a tireless fundraiser for various charities, especially the General Hospital and is the founding director of Crimestoppers in Kelowna and of Childfind.

Prominent Kelowna businessman Walter Grey, who operates a network of four radio stations in the West Kootenays, will be master of ceremonies.

Cliff and Lois Serwa

The dinner is sponsored by the Okanagan Jewish Community. Tickets are $75 per person. For more information contact Alvin Lander at 604-868-3580 or Mel Kotler, 604-860-6866, or any member of the Oakangan Jewish Community.

JEWISH WOMEN'S FEDERATION TOGETHER UJA WOMEN'S CAMPAIGN

JEWISH WOMEN'S FEDERATION IS A DEPARTMENT OF THE JEWISH FEDERATION OF GREATER TORONTO

Large Agenda for JWF President

Glennie Lindenberg

Glennie Lindenberg wants to make more women comfortable with Jewish community organizations. She wants to see more women holding senior leadership positions, and she'd like the Jewish Women's Federation to tackle more issues of the day.

That should keep Glennie Lindenberg busy not only for her incoming term as JWF President, but also for several years beyond.

Thinking big is not one of Glennie's problems. The Toronto lawyer has been an active volunteer for 13 years, beginning with what was then UJA's embryonic Business & Professional Women's Network.

"There was a certain excitement about getting involved in something new," she recalls. Today, there are 1500 women on the B&P mailing list.

Inclusion is a priority for Glennie. She's planning strengthened communication between JWF and its 50 affiliated organizations, and more aggressive outreach to community newcomers.

By the time Glennie's term is over, she hopes to share the spotlight with other women who have been promoted to upper leadership ranks in the community. She would like her legacy to be cracking those "glass ceilings" with which women are confronted, trying to get ahead.

Barbara Bank eyes the North

Barbara Bank

The largest Jewish population growth in the Metro Toronto area is north of Steeles. That's an important centre of attention for urban planning specialist Barbara Bank, the incoming head of UJA's Women's Campaign.

"There's a real lack of involvement in the north," she says. The exploding population means more difficulty finding the unaffiliated and the uninvolved. So, under Barbara's direction, canvassers this year will be concentrating more strongly on Thornhill, Richmond Hill, Markham and outlying neighbourhoods.

Last year, 10,000 women's cards were canvassed overall, which is an awesome accomplishment, but represents only a fraction of Jewish women in the Metro region.

Barbara and Jewish Women's Federation President Glennie Lindenberg agree that responding to social concerns, such as women whose husbands refuse them a "get", is one way to attract more campaign participants. Barbara believes women's issues and successfully soliciting tzedaka are closely linked.

"Women are very intelligent with their giving and much more selective. If you don't provide something meaningful, money will go elsewhere."

We extend our best wishes to Glennie, Barbara and their entire team as they assume their new leadership roles. Thanks to the Toronto Jewish Community for their support and commitment. It has been a privilege to work with you in strengthening our community.

Seeking Passover Partnerships

You could call it a foster Seder.

For the fifth consecutive year, Marsha Slavens and Susan Goldberg are seeking Canadian families who will welcome newly arrived Russians at their seder table. Last year, 150 families acted as hosts and Marsha is hoping to have "at least that many this year."

Susan and Marsha are volunteers with the UJA funded Community Integration Program, jointly sponsored by the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto and the Jewish Community Centre.

Passover family matchmaking is more complex than it sounds. Susan, Marsha and Roseanne Zarnett, program director of the JCC's northern branch, try to create compatibility in several categories - language, numbers of children and religious observance.

The Russian guests are thoroughly briefed before Passover, so they know what to expect when they knock on the door.

"It's overwhelming for them," says Marsha, "to learn about the holiday, how to dress and what to give as presents."

The evaluations from both sides have been enthusiastic. For many families, friendships have endured well beyond Passover. As Susan sums it up: "I can't say that we've had any bad experiences."

This year's seders, by the way, are Saturday night March 26 and Sunday, March 27.

If you would like to offer your home, please call the Seder Hotline at 631-5680.

Looking for Parenting Tips? Coloroso's Coming

Barbara Coloroso

One of North America's most highly regarded experts on parenting will be offering Torontonians her recipe for humane discipline this spring. She's Barbara Coloroso, with a husband, three children and a masters degree in special education. She'll be delivering her lecture on April 11, 7 p.m., Adath Israel Congregation, 37 Southbourne.

Mrs. Coloroso suggests transmitting to children six fundamental messages: "I believe in you. I trust you. I know you can handle it. You are listened to. You are cared for. You are very important to me." These, she says, are starting points for success in life. She also makes a strong distinction between punishing children and disciplining them, with punishment set aside for adults and discipline for kids.

Barbara Coloroso's presentation, Winning at Parenting, is being sponsored by the UJA Women's Campaign, the Business & Professional Women's Network, the Jewish Women's Federation and the Board of Jewish Education.

Jewish Women's Federation, a department of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, is the umbrella organization for 50 Jewish women's volunteer organizations in Toronto. JWF brings together women from a broad spectrum of ideological backgrounds to network, to develop leadership skills, to address important social and political action issues and to help integrate new Canadians into the Jewish community.

JWF is open to all Jewish women's organizations which provide services to the local Jewish community and/or Israel, have been in existence for two years, manifest a clear organizational structure and support the United Jewish Appeal Campaign. If your organization would like to join the JWF "umbrella," please call Lisa Morrison at 631-5704.

Jewish Community is Providing More Support for Abused Women

by Lori Dennis

The Jewish community has stepped up its efforts in the past few years to support abused women, says Rayna Knobler, Supervisor of Women's Abuse Programs at Jewish Family and Child Service (JF&CS).

"I can't say whether there is a greater incidence of abuse now or whether it's that women are feeling more comfortable talking about their problems, but since 1988, when our support services began, there has been an increase in demand and an increase in the number of therapy groups offered. In 1988, 5% of our caseload was about wife abuse. Today that figure has risen to between 10 and 15%." In 1992 women abuse was a factor in 300 cases and the number grew last year.

Several support groups are offered at JF&CS. For the first time last spring there was an incest survivors' group. A second twelve-week session is now being planned. There are groups for women who experience sexual assault and date rape, therapy for women in abusive relationships (which includes physical, psychological, and verbal abuse) and groups for men who are abusers.

"My opinion," says Knobler, "is that the Jewish community is doing a good job in supporting abused women. But we can always do more... We need to do more outreach, particularly to those – such as Israeli and Soviet Jews – who can't access us because of language or cultural barriers."

The first sign of abuse to look for is an excessive amount of control being wielded by the husband or partner. When the spouse is controlling his wife through money, other rights, or physical constraints, it's time to look at the situation and explore other options, Knobler advises.

- Jewish Family and Child Service (JF&CS) at (416) 638-7800 – for protective shelter, education, and counselling services. For after-hours emergencies or for immediate assistance, call JF&CS at (416) 614-4114.
- Your synagogue or temple for a support group. Organize one if one doesn't exist.

AIDS ... is a Jewish Issue

by Mara Koven, Freelance Journalist and Former Senior Planning Associate of Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto

Contrary to popular belief, Jews do contract AIDS and do become infected with HIV. In fact, Jews contract AIDS in the same proportion as the general community. There are approximately 80 Jews living with AIDS in Toronto and three times as many infected with HIV.

The Holy Blossom Temple Committee for AIDS and the AIDS Task Force of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto emphasize that AIDS is a cause for real concern in our community; and if we wish to address the issue we must overcome our denial and discomfort.

AIDS is everyone's disease. Heterosexual women in North America are the number one group on the rise for contracting AIDS. Recent studies indicate that those who received blood transfusions prior to blood screening in 1985 may be at risk. Anyone who has not been in a monogamous relationship since the 1980's may have cause for concern. But for now, gay men are living with AIDS more than any other group.

The Jewish community has not voiced consensus on the subject of homosexuality; however, we must agree on the importance of health and caring. As members of the Jewish people, we are taught that each Jew is responsible for every Jew. Similarly, in the spirit of Jewish tradition, we are to fulfill the command of bikur cholim - offering care and comfort to the sick.

A combined effort of positive action and change in attitude is required to address AIDS in the Jewish community.

Action:

- As a board member, or as a concerned individual, lobby for a support program at your temple or synagogue. Address the issue with your Rabbi and the board.
- If you are a board member of a Jewish pedagogical institution, or a concerned individual, advocate for the incorporation of material which has been developed for AIDS education from a Jewish perspective. Search out members of the community who are willing to talk about this topic to our children.
- Become a volunteer for the Holy Blossom AIDS Assist Program - (416) 789-1187.
- Contact Stephen Stolero, Chairperson, Committee for Orthodox Response - (905) 661-2577.

ZERO TOLERANCE of Violence Against Women

Highlights of the Canadian Panel on Violence Against Women

Last summer, the Canadian Panel on Violence Against Women presented its long-awaited report, including the National Action Plan, which calls for a government policy of zero tolerance of violence against women. It also appeals for legal changes and increased bureaucratic structures to oversee the policy. What follows are highlights of this important study.

Sexual Abuse of Girls (age 16 and under):

- 54% of the women had experienced some form of unwanted or intrusive sexual experience before reaching the age of 16. Almost half of these entailed forced or attempted forced sexual intercourse.
- 43% reported at least one experience of incest and/or extra-familial sexual abuse before age 16.
- 96% of perpetrators of child sexual abuse were men.

Sexual Abuse of Women (age 16 and over):

- 51% of women have been the victim of rape or attempted rape.
- 40% reported at least one experience of rape.
- Using the criminal code definition of sexual assault two out of three women have experienced what is legally recognized to be sexual assault.
- 81% of sexual assault cases at the level of rape or attempted rape reported by women were perpetrated by men who were known to the women.

Physical Assault in Intimate Relationships:

- 27% of women have experienced a physical assault in an intimate relationship.
- In 25% of the cases, women who were physically assaulted reported that their partners explicitly threatened to kill them. (An earlier survey showed that in 1989, 57% of all women murdered in Canada died as a result of domestic violence.)
- All of the physical assaults on women were perpetrated by male intimates.

B.C. premier denounces discrimination

Harcourt praises Multiculturalism Act

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Racism and discrimination based on a person's cultural heritage is unacceptable in British Columbia, said Premier Mike Harcourt as he officially opened the province's Multicultural Week, Feb. 13-19.

Speaking at a reception arranged by the Affiliation of Multicultural Societies and Service Agencies of B.C. (AMSSA), of which Canadian Jewish Congress Pacific region is a member, Harcourt said Multiculturalism Week "is an opportunity for all of us to promote a better understanding of multiculturalism and its contribution to community building. My government recognizes the importance of multiculturalism in this province."

The premier pointed out that "for the first time in our province's history we have established a Multiculturalism Act. This Act helps advance cross-cultural understanding . . . and a society free from racism and racial discrimination." (The Act was passed by the Legislature at its last session in 1993.)

Harcourt said the Act recognizes the inherent right of each British Columbian to be treated with dignity. It also fosters good citizenship because "people respect the law when the law respects them."

Later in the week Multiculturalism and Human Rights Minister Moe Sihota hosted an open house at the Multiculturalism B.C. offices in Vancouver. He told the large attendance that "this week-long celebration recognizes and celebrates the cultural diversity that contributes so much to the enrichment of our province. It's also an opportunity to look at ways of encouraging everyone's full and effective participation in society."

Multicultural events were held throughout the province. One of them was the opening night of The Diary of Anne Frank, arranged by the Jewish Festival of the Arts Society with Carousel Theatre of Vancouver. It was announced also that the Carousel Theatre and Vancouver Holocaust Centre are co-operating in the production of a play for young people, Goodbye Marianne, by survivor Irene Kirsten Watts, which tells the story of a young girl fleeing the horrors of Nazi Germany to freedom and a new life in Canada. The Vancouver Holocaust Centre Society and Carousel have each received a grant of $10,000 from Multiculturalism B.C., a government agency, to help finance the production. The play, which premieres in November, will tour the province.

In Victoria, public tours of Victoria cultural sites were held during the week. These were designed "to familiarize people with the history and contributions of several of the cultural groups in the city. One of the places visited was Congregation Emanu-El, the 130-year-old synagogue.

Soldiers Association completes pledge for summer camp

Toronto's pledge of $350,000.00 to finance a summer camp for widows and orphans of fallen Israeli soldiers was recently completed in Israel by Mrs. Carol Baratz, Chanukah Campaign Chair for the Association for the Soldiers of Israel, Toronto Branch.

During a recent visit to Israel, Mrs. Baratz presented a cheque completing Toronto's pledge to the Association Chairman, Brig. Gen. (Res.) Rami Dotan.

Dotan expressed appreciation to Mrs. Baratz and all Canadian supporters for helping the widows and orphans of fallen soldiers to carry on living with dignity and hope.

Israeli vice-consul explains the importance of peace

By MOURA WOLPERT
Special to The CJN

HAMILTON — Agreements on hard-core issues like Jerusalem and the settlements stand a far better chance of success if they are negotiated in an atmosphere of good will, an Israeli diplomat told a Rotary Club meeting here.

"Let's take what we agreed upon at this point in time and start by changing people's lives now," said vice-consul Haim Waxman.

Waxman was addressing 45 members of the Hamilton East-Wentworth Rotary Club at a luncheon meeting. It was his second area address in recent weeks and he is planning a third.

Waxman said Israel knew from the beginning that if negotiations on Jerusalem and the settlements were started now, they could continue "for the next 10 years without getting even close to an agreement."

The audience listened attentively as Waxman discussed the current peace talks and the reasons behind Israel's insistence on first tackling "issues that affect people's lives" rather than territorial questions.

Money and resources now being poured into the arms race, he said, could be diverted to transportation, communications, energy and tourism after a comprehensive regional peace agreement.

Waxman said "we must also fight those who use violence to kill peace treaty," and called upon friends in the international community" to help make people realize that peace can help solve the area's "real problems."

Waxman sent out dozens of letters to Rotary clubs in September offering to give talks. He told The CJN that he was "shocked" by the number of replies. Between 10 to 15 replies came the first week. Waxman has spoken to Rotary clubs in Toronto, London and Brantford. He plans to visit as many clubs as he can.

It is the first time such a project has been undertaken.

The response to his talks, he said, has been "very, very positive. People are very interested to hear more than they learn through the media."

Regency Interiors 2000 and Union Electric:

offers the best in lighting and furnishings

Two of Toronto's most prestigious home furnishings companies have joined together to offer retail customers a unique setting for home decorating purposes. Regency Interiors 2000 has joined Union Electric in their existing location to offer the finest in lighting and furniture under one roof.

Carrying on a tradition established by Max Kingston, previous owner of Regency Interiors, Sal DiMeglio, President of Regency Interiors 2000, is committed to continue to offer customers award-winning furniture designs at very reasonable prices with the same quality and service people have come to expect from a Regency product.

As pioneers in lacquered linen laminates on furniture and creators of unusual finishes on furniture such as granite, stone, leather and wood, Regency is recognized for their customized work and attention to detail. Bedrooms, bathrooms, living rooms, dens, wall units and occasional tables are the showpieces of their line which is enhanced by a selection of ready-made furniture from Italy on the showroom floor.

Customers can sit down with DiMeglio and design their own furniture together, or choose from a large selection of designs and customize the finishes and colors. Personal attention and service are important at Regency and customers can be assured of a quality product, lots of compliments and years of enjoyment from their furniture.

Union Electric boasts one of the largest lighting showrooms in North America. Partners Mark Naimer and David Abergel offer "everything from the extraordinary to the affordable", including alabaster, crystal, marble, fossil stone and wrought iron fixtures with accent finishes in solid brass, bronze, Verdi green and gold plate. On entering the Union Electric showroom, you can look in all directions—up, down, and on all sides to see the eclectic mix of lighting fixtures and styles for inside and outside the home.

Lighting for exteriors and landscaping is a separate feature of the mammoth showroom. A complete line of dimming and switching controls, intercoms, fans, table lamps, wall and ceiling fixtures and halogen bulbs are available as finishing touches.

Complementing the showroom are wrought iron furniture pieces, mirrors and prints which can be purchased.

Union takes pride in its marketing mix which takes care of the budget shopper as well as the design community. You can find a $20,000 chandelier or a $39 halogen track kit. Naimer and Abergel and their knowledgeable staff take great pains to assess their customer's needs. They travel around the world to purchase products that ensure their selection is second to none in range and quality.

Union and Regency have combined their marketing and advertising initiatives but maintain separate independent companies.

EDGEPORT HOMES: specializes in constructing luxury homes

Edgeport Homes, specialists in the construction of luxury homes in communities across Metro for the past 10 years, is taking its reputation into the first-time buyers' market.

Aurora Grove, consisting of upscale semi-detached homes for discriminating first-time buyers, is centrally located in the heart of Aurora and is clearly Edgeport's most successful site in five years, according to president, Jeff Silverberg. "We've sold over 30 homes in the first three months of sales and we are finding a strong response from the Jewish community. A lot of young, sophisticated, Jewish couples are moving into Aurora Grove because of the nice location, good product and right price."

The houses, ranging in price from $166,900 to $209,900 and in size from 1,380 to 2,200 square feet, are designed by architects Lorne Rose and Richard Wengle at Richard Wengle Architects "are spectacular. Special selling features include direct vent gas fireplaces, a five-piece appliance package and a mortgage financed at 6.9 per cent for 5 years for which 80 to 90 per cent of the purchasers are opting. We also allow purchasers to put down a 5 per cent deposit insured by Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation," says Silverberg.

Jeff Silverberg

The three and four bedroom homes also include two or three bathrooms on the second floor, Paris kitchen cabinetry in the kitchen and bathrooms and an optional 3-piece roughed-in bathroom in the basement. "Everything is designed to suit the most discriminating tastes. When purchasers move in, they are content with their choice of homes. In today's economy, this is a great home at a great price. What more can first-time buyers ask for?"

> "What more can first-time buyers ask for?"

Silverberg says that Edgeport, builders of over 300 homes in prestigious communities such as Bayview Hill, The Bayview Hunt Club in Richmond Hill, Stonehaven in Newmarket and Brampton Olde Towne, is known for its after sales service. "We have won the excellence award from Ontario New Home Warranty Program for our service and we have no conciliations with the warranty program. If something needs fixing, we take care of it immediately and because of this service record, we have a lot of very happy customers."

To get to Aurora Grove, take the 404 north to Aurora Road, turn left on Aurora Road and go west to Bayview and south on Bayview to the Aurora Grove site. Hours are Monday to Thursday, noon to 8 p.m. and weekends 11 a.m. to 6 p.m. The site is closed on civic holidays.

Ascot Mansion's luxury suites

Shane Baghai is still building many of the large luxury homes that made him famous. Although there is a smaller market for luxury homes, it has not totally disappeared. Baghai is currently building several custom homes in the $700,000 to $800,000 range.

Baghai will build on a client's property to the client's specifications; he will also buy a lot, build a home on it and offer it for sale. He builds anywhere in the Toronto area, whether in Rosedale, Forest Hill, Edwards Gardens, York Mills or the Bayview corridor.

For the fine touches that distinguish his mansions from his competitors', he has always given credit to his loyal stable of finishing craftsmen. Although most of his new projects are for buyers who are not in the luxury market, he employs the same craft workers for these projects as he does for homes of several thousand square feet.

These craftsmen will be working at Ascot Mansions, a medium-rise condominium apartment complex Baghai will be building at the northwest corner of Leslie and John Street in Thornhill. These are one-, two- or three-bedroom suites ranging in size from 700 to 1,510 square feet, with prices ranging from $118,300 to $267, 270. There is one five storey and one six storey residential wing with a shared lobby. The north wing has 16 different floor plans, the south 14.

The decrease in space does not entail a compromise in quality. Baghai takes pride in his reputation, and intends to maintain it. Each suite has a whirlpool bath, marble and ceramic flooring, marble windowsills, wood-framed doorways and 4 1/2-inch baseboards. In a Baghai home, these finishing touches are expected. In the kitchen, bath and laundry, there are top-line appliances.

Ascot Mansions is Baghai's third condominium project. The first, designed by architect Arthur Erickson, was Watergarden at Bayview and Finch Avenue . This project, where prices ran up to $1,200,000, is 80 per cent sold. His second project, York Mills Mansions, consisted of 56 units cut into a hillside in Hogg's Hollow. This site, where prices exceeded $300,000, is nearly sold out. The architectural firm Raphael & Bigauskas, which designed York Mills Mansions, also designed Ascot Mansions.

Because many condo buyers are security conscious, Baghai will be installing the latest security features at Ascot Mansions. These include cameras in the underground garage, and vestibules with two-way communications between residents and the 24-hour security staff in the lobby.

Bridlepath is handling sales at Ascot Mansions, and has a sales office on the site. Associate broker Carolyn Feldman, who also handles Mr. Baghai's custom homes, as well as the condominiums. More information is available at 905-889-5194 or call the office at 416-449-0090.

Location is a key factor at Fieldgate

Elegant styles, luxury appointments and a great location all add up to make Fieldgate Bathurst a superb place to live.

Fieldgate Homes, currently building in Oakville, Richmond Hill and two locations in Mississauga, is proud to present its ongoing project in an upscale Thornhill neighborhood near Bathurst Street and Highway 7. With about 200 lots in the project, 75 have been sold and more than 60 homes are already occupied.

Location is the key to buying any home, and at Fieldgate Bathurst homebuyers can't ask for more convenience. Promenade Mall is minutes away, public transportation is close, a park is nearby and every type of school from day care to French immersion, public and Hebrew day schools is in the vicinity.

If it is luxury for which you're looking, the marble gas fireplace in every family room and a choice of either plush 35-ounce broadloom, parquet or ceramic floor tile is for you. Add an ensuite washroom with an oval tub, a separate shower and twin-sink vanity, all-clay brickwork, casement windows, a double garage and a sidelight window at the front entry and you've got a home in which you can luxuriate.

Fieldgate Homes offer 24 models arrayed on 40- and 50-feet lots stretching from 115 to 130 feet deep. A selection of premium cul-de-sac, treed and oversized lots are available. The 40-foot lots, ranging from 2,018 to 3,068 square feet, are priced from $265,900 to $348,900. The 50-foot lots start at 2,470 square feet for a two-storey, three-garage home to the 4,060 square feet flagship model. Prices start at $329,900 to $409,900. The homes feature up to five bedrooms, 2½ to 3½ bathrooms, walk-in closets in the master bedroom, a main-floor laundry in most models, mirrored sliders on the hall closet and a cold cellar.

To enhance these luxurious homes, every one has oak stairs, handrails and pickets, colored plumbing fixtures, single-level faucets, a pedestal sink in the powder rooms, Classique doors and a high-efficiency furnace. For future improvements, all homes receive rough-ins for a security system, a dishwasher and a garage-door opener.

Fieldgate Homes is located on Bathurst Street, one light south of Highway 7. The sales office is on the west side of Bathurst. Office hours are 1 to 8 p.m. Monday to Thursday, 1 to 5 p.m. Fridays and 11 a.m. to 6 p.m. Sundays. For more information, call 889-2949 or CMF Realty, the exclusive realtor for this project, at 241-6000.

The best bathroom renovations because that's all they do

A bathroom renovation can be a major factor in adding to the value of your home and the quality of your life because you use your bathroom every day.

If your renovation is handled by bathroom specialists Derek, Rick or Michael LaMarche of Just Bathrooms, you deal with people who deliver quality craftmanship and service.

The LaMarche brothers have renovated more than 1,900 bathrooms in Toronto, and they firmly believe that keeping customers in the picture throughout, and doing the work properly, on schedule and with minimum disruption, are company cornerstones for success.

"We give our clients total service all the way," says Derek. "We go to the home and provide a free estimate. If this is satisfactory we take them out shopping for materials and fixtures to help co-ordinate everything. For instance, the white of a tub in most cases won't match the white of tiles unless you're very careful. This way it all turns out exactly as the customer desires.

Showroom

"Some companies show you material only from their showroom, which limits the customer's choice. Some contractors show only inferior material to lower the price. At Just Bathrooms we'll show and select the best products from the nicer displays at Taps, Ginger's, American Standard, Centura and Ramca. We buy these high-quality products from whichever of these fine companies gives us the best price.

Quality labor

"We then install this quality material with quality labor. That way your new bathroom will last forever.

"Just Bathrooms has two strict rules," he continues. "We don't start a job until all materials are on hand and once started we're there every day until it's finished.

"We put down drop sheets [and] install a temporary shower and toilet facilities. Usually we can finish everything in two weeks and then there's a final inspection by the homeowner before paying the agreed amount."

Just Bathrooms is pleased to provide neighborhood references, which include nine pages of names and phone numbers of their previous customers. Just Bathrooms is always happy to show some of the beautiful bathrooms they have created for their clientele.

All work and materials are fully guaranteed for 12 years (some conditions apply).

Here's how to gain a lot more liveable space

"Most homes in Toronto are wasting 50 per cent of their liveable space." So says Steven Kirsch, president of Kirsch Construction and Project Management Inc. "Most people are amazed how much more liveable space they can create."

Kirsch suggests people get rid of poorly designed kitchens, clumsily arranged bathrooms, inefficient closets and dark, low basements cluttered by old furnaces and poor layout. When they do, their homes seem almost 50 per cent larger.

Kirsch and his partner Mark Cowan also find that many homes lack a sense of open airy space. People should open up their homes when remodelling, renovating or decorating to capture the sunlight and feeling for the environment.

Kirsch heads up Kirsch Construction, a renovation, construction and project management company that integrates home and natural environment. He grew up in Toronto, and now resides here, but his design and construction sense was forged in the American South West — La Jolla, California; Sedona, Arizona; and Rosarita, Mexico.

There he learned the secrets of blending light, landscape, textures, materials and colors to create a warm, natural feeling that can make a home a happier place. Cowan also grew up in Toronto and comes from a fashion background which enables him to bring a superb sense of style to bear upon colors, textures, fabrics and decor.

As Kirsch and Cowan remark, "When we look at a home, we look not only at the inside but at the outside as well — the view, the sources of light. We consider how to blend the two to maximize the whole environment." In a sense it is the Santa Fe feeling adapted to the specific opportunities of Toronto.

Torontonians now have a greater range of affordable materials from which to choose and Kirsch and Cowan select quality materials to give a warm, rich feeling to a home. Each home is "contextualized" — to give the right harmonious feel.

Affordable

Kirsch and Cowan prefer to mix 'n match materials to create a special mood — tiles into wooden floors; granite and stucco; or tile, limestone and marble to create spectacular entrances. Labor and many materials are now cheaper than ever before.

As an owner builder for the past 20 years, Kirsch knows first-hand the stress of renovation, both financial and emotional. Working closely with homeowners, architects and designers, Kirsch and Cowan create distinctively different rich effects at inexpensive prices. Maybe it's time more Torontonians learned how to Santa Fe their homes!

Find out how you can gain a lot more liveable space. Call Kirsch or Cowan at (416) 504-0622 today to set up an appointment.

Increase your living space up to 50%! We'll show you how.

Lawrence Park West

TOWNHOMES

Lawrence Park West. The community you love to live in - for its centrality, its energy, its cosmopolitan flair. The community that represents all that's great about Toronto, all that makes you wild about living in the city. Until now, it was prohibitively expensive. But times are changing. The Homes of Lawrence Park West are coming very soon.

Take a walk through Midtown's Lawrence Park neighbourhood. Explore the majestic beech forests in Sherwood Forest near Yonge and Lawrence, follow the West Don, walk the ravines, spot the wildlife and see if you don't get lost in a world you didn't know existed. Then find your way back to Yonge and check out the speciality shops from Lawrence down to Eglinton - Sheridan Nurseries for the horticulturist, and Sporting Life and Roots for the fashion conscious, and a whole host of other stores that enhance a casual stroll. The Homes of Lawrence Park West put all this within walking distance from your own front door. And the price? Well perhaps at one time the neighbourhood you love was out of your reach, but now you can live in Lawrence Park for love and money!

Now head west. You pass the subway which makes downtown or uptown immediately accessible. Walk through Chatsworth Ravine Park and there's Glenview Public School,

The Homes of Lawrence Park West

Lawrence Park Collegiate and Havergal College, three of Toronto's finest and most sought after educational institutions. Just a short walk from The Homes of Lawrence Park West.

North on Avenue Rd. to Pusateri's and pick up some of those wild sauces and homemade pasta everyone's raving about, and perhaps a quick stop for lunch at Trattoria Primavera, before heading over to Winners in Lawrence Plaza for the latest in family fashion.

Now you're almost home. In your wildest dreams did you ever dream of owning here for only $130,000? In your own duplex townhome or city loft overlooking the park, near the Barbara Frum Library? In one of the finest, most sought after communities in Metro?

COMING SOON

Welcome to the Homes of Lawrence Park West. It's Your Neighbourhood At Your Price. The community you love at a price that's easily the best value in the city. From $130,000, to $195,000. This is a unique opportunity, so if you're interested give us a call TODAY at 782-1166.

Custom-ordered pieces specialty of Perkins & Pape

Perkins & Pape at 365 Eglinton Ave. W. is a special kind of furniture store. The principle on which partners Nancy Perkins and Joan Pape Cohen operate is not to buy an inventory and "move" it, but to meet the needs of individual customers.

The purchase of furniture is not impulse buying; it is an investment, and demands thought and care. A sofa or dining room suite stays in the home for years, and becomes part of the living environment.

With the exception of a few one-of-a-kind items, every piece of furniture is custom ordered; delivery takes one to three months. The items in the showroom—all of which are favorites of the owners—are there to give the customer an idea of the variety and quality which the manufacturers offer. Over 60 manufacturers are represented. Showroom and warehouse costs are kept to a minimum, making it possible to keep prices reasonable and at the same time maintain quality.

Among the items offered by Perkins & Pape are: reproduction mahogany from England and the United States; over-stuffed slipcovered sofas and chairs; custom painted pine furniture from five different suppliers, in styles ranging from North American rustic to Country, Italian and faux finishes; home office furniture; patio furniture; home theatre centres; Belgian and French tapestries for the wall; wrought iron chairs, tables, beds and other kinds of furniture, ready made or custom crafted.

Accessories, however, can be bought right off the floor. These include unique lamps, lush chenille throw rugs in plaids and solids, damask and tapestry covered boxes in three sizes, hand-painted oil cloths, throw pillows, mirrors, and other items which Perkins calls "gorgeous t'shatshkes".

Perkins & Pape offers gift certificates as well. These are ideal for anyone who wants to give furniture or accessories, while letting the person who receives them enjoy some freedom to choose. Perkins & Pape is also a great source of unique wedding gifts. With spring approaching, furniture and accessories should be considered as a gift option along with china or crystal. Now, before the onset of warm weather, is also a good time to order patio furniture.

Perkins & Pape also offers a home decorating service. For a modest fee which is refundable with the first purchase, a designer will visit your home to help you choose and place new furniture, or refurbish and update your present style.

For all your furnishing needs, Perkins & Pape will be happy to be your inspiration. Call (416)487-0120.

Unprecedented success for Greenpark Renovations

Greenpark Homes, Canada's largest low-rise residential home builder, entered the over $4 billion a year renovation industry over a year ago with the launch of Greenpark Renovations and Custom Homes, and has experienced unprecedented success.

"Now people have an alternative to the one or two-man contractor," says Lou Frustaglio, Canadian Renovator of the Year and president of Greenpark Renovations. "We are Canada's first and only major brand name renovator and we bring to our customers, strengths that have helped make Greenpark Homes the most-chosen builder in the country.

"Our success stems from trust, the single most important issue with families when it comes to renovating their home. People don't just want promises, they want someone to turn to who they know will get the job done right the first time. And if there are problems either before, during or after the process, they want someone who they know will be there for them. That is what Greenpark Renovations is all about. It is a name people know. A name that people can trust. A name with the backing of the country's largest home builder. We're here to put an entirely new face on the Canadian home renovation industry."

Greenpark Renovations, based in Concord, Ontario, handles all types of renovation projects, from minor interior work in bathrooms and kitchens, to additions, second storeys and finished basements, as well as customizing a dream home. "Most important of all, our customers get competitive prices, superb workmanship and personalized service, all backed by the largest team of skilled tradesmen in the industry," says Frustaglio.

"Every home we work on is unique"

He says that even though Greenpark Renovations is affiliated with the largest new home builder in Canada, it is a small company at heart and it takes pride in its custom, hands-on approach. "Every home we work on is unique. That is why one of our biggest strengths is the fact that we have the design skills to meet the specific and individual needs of families who want to renovate or custom build a home."

When asked what service he would give to a family considering its first renovation, Frustaglio replies, "I'd tell them to trust the name they know."

Please don't imagine that we sell cheap furniture – we don't! But we do sell fine quality furniture for less – sometimes surprisingly less. There's no mystery, we're not a large store and our overhead is lower than our competitors.

Not that we expect you to sacrifice selection for savings. We offer a wide range of elegant traditional and contemporary furniture equal to larger stores and if we don't have the piece you're looking for on the floor, we're confident you'll find it in our extensive selection of catalogues.

The more you've shopped around, the more you'll appreciate the service we offer. Above all, we believe that furnishing your home should leave you feeling comfortable, emotionally and financially.

Sutton's grand opening

Father-and-son team Sol and Murray Goldkind, before opening their Sutton Group franchise, had 25 years' real-estate sales experience between them. They worked in Toronto, Thornhill and Richmond Hill, selling both residential and commercial properties, and gained experience which enables them to empathize both with the real-estate agent and the client.

To Murray, franchises seem the wave of the future in real estate. Agents want the flexibility and decentralization that goes with being an independent operator; clients want personal service, and often feel that they are better served by an independent operator than by the branch office of a huge firm. At the same time, clients are more mobile, transfer or relocate often, and want access to the largest possible information network—which means that the agent too needs such information. Franchises combine the benefits of national information networks and community familiarity.

What holds for franchises in general, Murray believes, is especially true for the Sutton Group with its international referral network. The Sutton Group, which operates in Canada and the United States, is now Canada's second-largest real-estate organization, with 6,000 sales agents in this country. There are 50 offices in Ontario alone, and the Sutton Group's properties are listed with Toronto Real Estate Board's Multiple Listing Service, which ensures intense local market coverage.

Sutton Group Admiral's association fees for agents are currently the lowest of all the Sutton franchises in the Toronto area. 100% of the commission goes to the agent, who pays only for the office services used. Along with greater financial rewards than a conventionally run office, the agent has greater independence. "With us," says Murray, "you work for yourself, but not by yourself." The agent, for example, decides the advertising budget for a property independently, without needing approval from management.

The client, of course, also benefits because it is easier for the agent to respond to the client's needs. Agent and client, for example, can work out between them what the advertising budget for a property should be, without having to consult a third party.

Sutton Group Admiral's office is fully computerized. High-tech equipment and information access go hand in hand with personal attention and service. Clients may call 739-7200, 24 hours a day. Because the office is in a busy commercial plaza, and on the ground floor, there is a good deal of walk-in business from the street. There are 20 reserved parking spaces for clients and agents.

The office of Sutton Group Admiral Realty is located at 1881 Steeles Ave. West, at the south-east corner of Dufferin and Steeles. Clients and agents are invited to the grand opening party on Tuesday, March 1, 4:30 p.m. to 9:00 p.m.

Mrs. Klein a nerve-tingling drama

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Whether you're a Freudian, or believe psychoanalysis is a waste of time and money, you'll find solace in Mrs. Klein, a nerve-tingling drama playing at The Tarragon Theatre until March 20.

British author Nicholas Wright cleverly plays both sides of the street in this play about the Jewish Viennese psychoanalyst Melanie Klein her daughter and professional rival, Melitta, and another Jewish analyst, Paula, who wants to become a patient-surrogate daughter to Melanie.

Though the action all takes place in London, England, on a day in 1934 when Melanie learns that her only son has been killed in a climbing accident, echoes abound from the Vienna which the Kleins left in 1926.

"It won't get any better," Melanie says when Paula tells her of the discrimination against Jews which forced her to leave Vienna in 1934. At another point, while trying to explain mother-daughter rivalry, Melanie declares: "I am a product of a boring, central European Jewish mother." Once she speaks disapprovingly of a "five course Jewish meal," and screams "drek, won't drek,drek," at her daughter's pronouncements.

Of more than passing interest is that director Glynis Leyshon has cast the real mother-and-daughter team of Janis and Sarah Orenstein to play the Kleins and they do a superb job, as does Donna Goodhand as Paula.

Mrs. Klein has all the elements of a whodunit and the enjoyable suspense that goes with it, as mother and daughter argue over whether Melanie's son died in an accident, or whether, as Melitta contends, he killed himself because he felt inadequate in his mother's eyes.

The witty script exposes a chilling professional ruthlessness on the part of Melanie Klein, so much so that anti-Freudians will take comfort. An author's note in the program explains that the elder Klein believed that infants developed anger and jealousy against their parents even before recognizing them, a view opposed by her daughter.

Far from being a passive observer of the scene, Paula's character is integral to understanding why Melitta hates her mother so much and why Melanie, though a dominating figure on the academic scene, was a skinflint who locked the liquor cabinet and nickel-and-dimed her staff.

Woody Allen has made a mint poking fun at his own expensive psychoanalysis. Despite its solid underpinning, Mrs. Klein will provide further grist for his mill.

BILL GLADSTONE'S EYE ON ARTS

In case you were wondering, you don't have to be fluent in Yiddish to enjoy the Canadian premiere of Der Yiddisher Mikado, set for March 5 and 6 at Toronto's Harbord Collegiate.

It is highly appropriate that Der Yiddisher Mikado is coming to Harbord, whose halls resounded with Gilbert and Sullivan and other theatrical productions half a century ago and more. Among the performers of these early shows were such "Harbordites" as comedians Frank Shuster and the late Johnny Wayne; maestro Victor Feldbrill; Polygram Pictures president Gordon Stulberg; composer John Weinzweig; Judge Phil Givens, former mayor of Toronto; and restauranteurs Sam Shopsowitz and his brother Izzie Shopsowitz.

Tickets for the three performances are $18, available at Ticketmaster (872-1111) or at Israel's Judaica or Lasting Impressions (635-0720). Tickets for the opening night gala are $50. Proceeds support the Yiddish Studies Program at the University of Toronto. Phone 635-2883 ext. 700 for further information.

Thornhill artist Elaine Clarfield-Gitalis, who teaches drawing and painting privately and color theory at Seneca College, is a gifted watercolorist whose latest canvases are on view at the Leah Posluns Theatre to March 20.

The series of paintings and collages on display was heavily influenced by Clarfield-Gitalis's latest trip to Israel last August. Flowers bursting with color are a favourite theme of the artist's, who explains the intensity of the colors reflects both her warm feelings for the country as well as the vibrant light and intense heat of summer. Other subjects include the Western Wall and Jerusalem sunsets.

In Search of Joy is a half-hour documentary that offers various people's definitions of and perspectives on joy. The award-winning film, which aired on CBC, became intensely personal for filmmakers Isabel Fryszberg and Tracy Thomson, who both lost their fathers during production. Unintentionally, they became part of the film as they discovered through their loss that one cannot experience true joy without responding honestly to pain.

Fryszberg, a child of Holocaust survivors, expects to attend a screening at the Adath Israel Synagogue, 37 Southbourne Ave., Monday March 7, at 8 p.m. The event is being sponsored by the Generation to Generation subcommittee of the Holocaust Remembrance Committee. Admission is $2.

A new book released this month by Fawcett Columbine tells a wrenching tale of self-discovery set on an Israeli kibbutz. It's Crossing the Border: An Erotic Journey is by Berkeley, Calif., resident Kim Chernin. Chernin has written numerous books about women over the past decade.

* * *

Narrated by Abba Eban, the five-part video documentary Israel: A Nation Is Born tells the story of the founding of the Jewish state and all subsequent martial conflicts. The film, an emotional journey through 50 years of history, takes an unbiased look at events of the past decade and includes rare archival footage.

Videoshoppers World of Ottawa is touting the five-part package as "the perfect bar-bat mitzvah gift" and an "essential textbook" for teachers. The firm is marketing the set for $149.95 plus shipping and handling. For more information, write to the company at 2181 Carling Ave., Ottawa K2B 7E8, or phone (toll-free) 1-800-565-FIND.

Carpet retailer "floors" clients with high quality, low prices

If you want a premium carpet but don't want to pay a premium price, Carpet by Colour may have the solution for you.

The company, which has been carpeting both residences and businesses for 25 years, sells direct to the public from their warehouse, where they carry a mind-boggling selection of colours and styles.

Unlike some warehouse outlets which are basically clearance centres for odds and ends, Carpet By Colour offers first-quality floor coverings in a pleasant, modern showroom. Vice-President of Sales Albert Sananes stresses the firm's commitment to customer service. "No job is too big or too small. Whether you want ten square metres or ten thousand, you get the royal treatment and the best price in the city – guaranteed."

The company also offers a free shop-at-home service, with no obligation to buy.

With passover fast approaching, carpet installations are on the rise, says Sananes. "Many people figure if they're going to install, they might as well do it now."

In addition to sales, the company offers a carpet repair service for both residential and commercial customers.

New children's entertainers delight kids, parents

Judy and David

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Two of Canada's newest children's entertainers, Judy and David, kept children and parents clapping and singing at a Sunday afternoon fundraising concert at the Beth Tikvah Synagogue.

Sponsored by the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University New Leadership Division, the concert was co-chaired by Michael Dodick and Lorne Persiko. The New Leadership Division, which welcomes individuals between the ages of 25 and 40 years, was formed in 1985 to develop awareness in Toronto of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem and its importance to the State of Israel, and to raise funds for specific academic projects at the university.

Judy and David, who live in Richmond Hill, have known each other for five years and have been married for two years. The duo recently released their first recording Jumpin' Up and Down, which they describe as a labor of love. The success of this recording led to a recording contract, and the couple produced four cassettes, which are sold together, titled, My Little Yellow Bus and creatively packaged in a wooden bus.

Classic songs

At the concert, Judy and David performed some of the songs from their tapes. They play both original and classic songs adding their own spirited interpretations. Their eclectic program which is geared to children age two to seven, included, I'm a Little Teapot, Choo Choo Train and Rock n' Roll Matzah Ball.

The overnight sensation say their philosophy is to make kids happy and present music that encourages audience participation.

"Our philosophy is to be ourselves," said David, who handles the business end. Judy, a music teacher for the North York Board of Education, looks after the music. The three-member Altogether Band appears with Judy and David at concerts.

And now the couple is going global. Within the next few months, their children's songs will begin to appear in 12 different languages in 28 countries around the world. Judy says Ontario audiences have been so appreciative that "we hope to keep doing regular appearances here as long as possible."

Finjan gets Juno nomination

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Finjan, the acclaimed Winnipeg-based klezmer band, has started 1994 on some freilache notes. Now in its twelfth year, the group was notified in early February that its album, Crossing Selkirk Avenue, has been nominated for a Juno Award in the World Best category.

At the same time, band members (consisting of Myron and Victor Schultz, Eli Herscovitch, David Koulack, Shayla Fink and Kinzey Posen) were also given a new, four-volume anthology of Yiddish folksongs compiled by the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

"It's fantastic," Posen says of the anthology. "It was a real pleasure to receive it. There is so much in there, some tunes that everyone knows and some that are obscure. We will be incorporating some of the music into our own."

The anthology was presented to Finjan by Yude Henteleff QC, past president of the Winnipeg chapter, Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University and vice president of the national organization. When Henteleff visited Israel recently, he was presented with the anthology by Sinai Leichter, a former Jewish National Fund shaliach to Winnipeg, who chaired the anthology project.

"Sinai and I are close friends," Henteleff says. "He still has strong feelings about Winnipeg. I am deeply touched and proud to have received this anthology. This is his way of honoring Winnipeg for its Yiddishkeit."

Honoring Winnipeg

Henteleff became aware of the project two years ago while attending a Hebrew University Board of Governors meeting. "This is a major contribution to the history of the Jewish People," he says. "A large part of our culture was obliterated by the Holocaust. Music has always been a way that people have expressed themselves."

The anthology consists of 340 songs, divided into different sections, which encompass every aspect of Jewish life and learning over the past 1,000 years. Each song has been translated into English and written out phonetically in Yiddish beside the original Yiddish words and musical notes.

"It is all there for everyone to understand and appreciate," Henteleff says. "This type of work will help preserve our endangered Yiddish heritage."

Henteleff felt it was important to give the volumes to Finjan because of the nature of their work. After they are finished going over the songs, the anthology will be donated to the Winnipeg Board of Jewish Education where students will have access to them and, through them, to the history of the Jewish people.

"The Hebrew University is truly the university of the Jewish people," Henteleff says. "This is just one small example of the work the university produces for the benefit and enlightenment of Jews everywhere."

Esther in Medieval Garb by Barry Dov Walfish (SUNY Press (paper) $23.95)

The Book of Esther, the basis for the popular festival of Purim has been the subject of much scholarly speculation. Best described as a novella, its historicity has been questioned. Its composition probably dates from the late Persian period (400-322 BCE). The central figures — Esther, Mordecai, Haman and Vashti — have left few historical traces. King Ahasverus has been tentatively identified with Xerxes the First (486-485 BCE) partly because of a notable figure in his court known as Marduka (Mordecai?).

The heroine of the Purim megillah (one of the five biblical scrolls attached to Jewish festivals) was first called Hadassah (myrtle) but later was given the Persian name Esther, which sounds suspiciously like the Babylonian goddess Ishtar.

The story is familiar. Esther, a Jewish orphan or foundling, is raised by her cousin Mordecai, a minor figure in the court of King Ahasverus. She is chosen in a beauty contest to succeed Vashti as consort to the King. Haman, a prominent court official and vicious anti-Semite, sends instructions throughout Persia for a massive pogrom "to destroy, to kill both young and old, little children and women in one day." Esther courageously transgresses court decorum to appeal for her people before the king. Haman is hanged on the gallows that he had erected for Mordecai.

Although the account of Esther's loyalty and courage are depicted without any religious overtones, she entered Jewish folklore and Midrash as a figure of female virtue, piety and determination — kin to Deborah, Judith and Hannah. The Talmud and the Midrash stress her extraordinary beauty, making her one of the four most beautiful women in the world — along with Rahab, Sarah and Abigail.

The Book of Esther, strangely, does not contain any mention of God. Nevertheless, Maimonides valued the book next after the Pentateuch, which indicates its importance in medieval Jewish life. For Jews through the ages the story has signified the inevitable downfall of the bigot and God's unfailing salvation.

Barry Dov Walfish, Jewish Studies librarian and lecturer in Jewish Studies at the University of Toronto has written a scholarly but readable work on how Jewish exegetes or commentators interpreted the Book of Esther in the Middle Ages — until about the year 1500.

Drawing on a great number of exegetes from all over the European continent — some of them unknown or little studied — he shows how the medieval Jewish world embraced the Book of Esther as part of its intellectual, religious and cultural life. This ground-breaking work is the most comprehensive account of Jewish medieval interpretation of any biblical book.

The author has divided the subject matter of the exegetes into intriguing categories: Persia through European Eyes, Gentile-Jewish Relations, Perceptions of anti-Semitism, The Royal Court, The Jews and the Monarchy. The insights of the commentators are often ingenious and clever as well as insightful and comforting.

Some of them are in the tradition of the Aggadah which delights in the fanciful and imaginative. A 13th century work, the Zohar, concerned with the union of a Jewish woman with a pagan king would have it that God sent down a female spirit in the guise of Esther to take her place with the king and that she never lived with him as his wife.

Jewish conversos in Spain and Portugal identified with Esther who did not reveal her religion but remained loyal to the traditions of her people in a hostile environment.

Walfish maintains that the Bible speaks to each new generation in a new way and needs to be constantly interpreted. Thus, the medieval scholars who studied and interpreted the Bible for their own times can have meaning for our age as well.

The book contains extensive notes, an invaluable bibliography and helpful subject indexes of author, title and subject.

Book of Esther has been subject of scholarly speculation

Finnish soprano raises funds to bring Soviet Jews to Israel

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Finnish soprano Marjatta Roine-Aaltonen has raised $6,300 for Soviet Jewry because "my heart is on fire" to bring Jews to Israel in fulfillment of a Biblical prophecy.

Now a resident of Peterborough, Ont., her mission began in 1991 when Roine-Aaltonen organized a concert in Finland three days after Operation Solomon, the airlift of Jews from Ethiopia to Israel. Israeli pilot and Finnish Jew Jerry Lawson was a special guest at the concert.

"It was a big surprise to me that there were black Jews in the world but it fulfills the prophecy in Isaiah," said Roine-Aaltonen.

She credits Toronto musician Bill Berle with teaching her Hebrew and Jewish songs at a time in life when she was grieving for her son killed in a car crash. She met Berle through her son's friendship with Berle's son, Paul Mathew, the third generation of a musical family. She went on to sing at bnei mitzvah and weddings with Berle's folk choir.

Bill Berle and Marjatta Roine-Aaltonen.

Sang Hebrew songs

At a concert in late January at the Agricola Finnish Lutheran Church in Willowdale, with Berle and his orchestra, she sang again the familiar Hebrew and Jewish songs that Berle taught her years ago. A total of $1,200 was raised.

She is a member of the Canadian Friends of the Christian Embassy in Jerusalem which has financed the journey of many Jews by plane and bus to Israel from the former Soviet Union.

"I can't understand why more churches in Canada aren't opening their doors to concerts to help Jews return to Israel," she said.

The January concert also featured the world premiere of It's Time for Peace, with lyrics by Toronto lawyer and Jewish book enthusiast Hy Bergel, set to music by Berle. One line of the song is, "The gates have flown open, the walls have come down, the Shofar of freedom is beginning to sound."

Other artists taking part were soloist Boris Shouster from Odessa, soprano Helen Bienstock, piano soloist and arranger Paul Mathew, and violinists of the York Symphony.

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — An exhibition of 54 photographs by noted New York artist, Victor Laredo will be on display at the Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, 470 Glencairn Ave., from March 6 to May 21.

Titled Tracing My Heritage: Victor Laredo's Photographs of Jewish Spain and Jewish Artifacts from the Sephardic Diaspora, the exhibition will be accompanied by a display of ritual artifacts from Sephardi communities, on loan from individuals and institutions in Toronto and Montreal.

Laredo's black and white original photographs were taken when he traveled to the home of his ancestors in Sephardi Spain. They document the vibrant life of a long-standing Jewish community which was brought to a halt with the Inquisition and the expulsion of the Jews in 1492 to various lands around the Mediterranean.

Laredo was born in the ancient Greek city of Pergamon in 1924. A photo-journalist, author and lecturer, Laredo's photographs have appeared in Harper's Bazaar, U.S. Camera Annual, Time and Life and he has exhibited in the Museum of Modern Art, the Brooklyn Museum and many other museums and galleries.

Curator of the Laredo exhibition is art historian Sharon Goelman, a member of the historical/museum committee at Shaarei Shomayim. Goelman, who also heads the volunteer committees for the event, received a master of fine arts degree from Concordia University, did graduate work at McGill University and taught art history in Montreal. After moving to Toronto in 1985, she worked at the McMichael Canadian Art collection in Kleinberg, Ont.

Goelman says that, after hearing that Laredo's photographs reflected his search for his Jewish roots in Spain, she contacted him in New York to arrange for the exhibit.

"We felt that we did not want the story to end with the expulsion, and so we searched out artifacts produced in lands to which Jews fled, such as Turkey, Italy, Morocco, Tunisia, Syria and Egypt, as well as communities of Sephardim who settled in Holland."

One of the photographs from the Victor Laredo Sephardi collection on exhibit at the Shaarei Shomayim Congregation.

The committee has therefore borrowed heirlooms and other objects from individual collectors and museums, items such as clogs for a mikvah (ritual bath), an alms box, a yahrzeit oil lamp, Book of Esther scrolls and Sefer Mishkanot Yaakov from the Great Synagogue in Aleppo, Syria, printed in the Ottoman Empire in 1721.

The community is invited to view the exhibition and attend the official opening on Sunday evening March 6, beginning with a viewing at 7 p.m. Laredo will give a short talk about Jewish life in Spain at 8 p.m., followed by a Sephardi musical program featuring Dr. Judith Cohen, a specialist in Judaeo-Spanish music, and Kelly Amar and Aaron Benchitrit. Sephardi refreshments will be served.

The exhibition is co-sponsored by the Sephardic Studies Program of Yeshiva University, the Canadian Friends of Yeshiva University and the Shaarei Shomayim Congregation.

The Sephardi exhibition is open Monday through Thursday, from 8 p.m. to 10 p.m., and Sundays from 9 a.m. to noon. For reservations or more information on the opening, or to arrange for special showings, call Helen at the Shaarei Shomayim, (416) 789-3213.

Filmmaker takes look at Chomsky

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Montreal filmmaker Mark Achbar is throwing three parties at once.

Manufacturing Consent, the documentary on intellectual Noam Chomsky and his view of the media, which he co-produced and co-directed, will have its television premiere on the CBC program Witness, 10 p.m. Feb. 28. It will be rebroadcast March 5 at 8 p.m. on CBC Newsworld.

Achbar also edited the companion book, which will be available in paperback ($19.95) before Feb. 28.

A package of six videotapes with 15- to 30-minute segments of the film is currently available in the United States. The package is a discussion starter and particularly suited for schools. It will be in Canada soon.

Achbar, whose parents Marjorie and Ben Achbar are retired and live in Ottawa (a sister, Francine, is an executive producer with WBZ-NBC in Boston), is pleased with the track record of his film. It has won a half dozen major awards in international competition since showing at the 1992 Festival of Festivals in Toronto, and is the most commercially successful Canadian documentary ever.

The two hour and 45 minute film has been trimmed by its producers to 97 minutes for the CBC showing. It still includes the segment in which Chomsky defends freedom of opinion for Holocaust denier and French writer Robert Faurisson, though he does not agree with him.

Mark Achbar

Chomsky states in the film: "It is a poor service to the memory of the victims of the Holocaust to adopt a central doctrine of their murderers."

Achbar filmed an interview with Faurisson in France during the five-year period in which he and co-producer and co-director Peter Wintonick worked on the film in 23 cities in seven countries. It was the first film ever done on Chomsky, a linguistics professor at Massachusetts Institute of Technology who believes the media are part of a conspiracy with international corporations to subvert democracy and suppress dissent.

A total of 1,500 libraries and universities have purchased a $34.95 videotape of the film which is available by rental from the National Film Board, a co-producer.

A review in the Canadian magazine Outlook states: "We are given insights into Chomsky's early family life and formative years. Born in 1928 in a lower middle-class New York home (both his parents were Hebrew teachers, his father becoming a prominent Hebrew linguist), he grew up in the Depression years.

"His family was left-labor Zionist in idelogical orientation, and favored Arab-Jewish co-operation and understanding. He himself showed an early interest in left politics, frequenting anarchist bookstores and reading the Fraye Arbiter Shtimme (Free Workers' Voices). He was also influenced by a news vendor uncle who employed him and encouraged him to scan the papers.

"As a young man, he was inspired by the kibbutz movement in Palestine, but eventually felt that the early Zionist ideals had become degraded."

Jewish museum in Greece captures heritage

By ESTELLE CRAIG

TORONTO — Most people visiting Greece can't wait to get to Athens where they make a beeline for the Acropolis to see the Parthenon, then probably the Plaka for its vast array of souvenirs and hundreds of Greek goodies. We did that, too, the first time we were there, many years ago.

This time, though, we had other places to visit, other things to do. One of the first was to check out the Jewish Museum of Greece. It was founded in 1977 to "collect, preserve and make public the surviving heritage of the Jews of Greece."

They have assembled a vast array of religious and ceremonial artifacts, costumes and embroideries, old photographs and documents pertaining to the Holocaust.

Today there are only 5,000 Jews remaining in Greece. Since World War II over 85 percent have either died or left the country. Greek Jews have a tradition going back to well before the third century BCE. After the conquests of Alexander the Great, Greece boasted large, flourishing Jewish communities. During the Roman-Byzantine Empire these Jews became known as the Romaniotes.

AMMAN (WZPS) — It was almost 9 a.m. when I got up to excuse myself from a breakfast meeting at the Laromme Hotel in Jerusalem. I had another meeting in Amman at 1 p.m. and didn't want to be late. So I made my way to Abdo Taxi opposite Damascus Gate and took a shared cab to the Jordanian border. Eight dollars, 25 minutes and one road block later, I was at the Allenby Bridge.

At Passport Control on the Israeli side, a young woman asked me several questions, then obliged me by not putting an Israeli stamp in my American passport. Across the bridge and a mile down the road, a young Jordanian provided an entrance permit, indicating — as plainly as a Star of David — that I had come from Israel.

Although major issues remain unresolved, such as Palestinian immigration to the territories and Jordanian fears of extremists fleeing from the territories to Jordan, there appears to be both the social and political good will to render tourism between Israel and Jordan routine by the end of the decade.

Nasri Atalla, director-general of Jordan's Ministry of Tourism, acknowledges that he is already making plans to receive Israeli tourists in Jordan. "Just look at the map," Atalla tells me in his Amman office. "We have a 300-mile border with Israel. For goodness sake, tourism between the two countries is natural."

In November 1993, Israel's minister of tourism Uzi Baram secretly met his Jordanian counterpart, Mohammed Radwan, in London. Unlike the politically-charged peace talks and the largely ceremonial meeting between Israeli foreign minister Shimon Peres and Jordan's Crown Prince Hassan in Washington, the London meeting was the first to deal with practical issues.

Mainly focusing on joint infrastructure and development projects, according to Baram, they discussed building a joint port to be shared by Aqaba and Eilat, which would allow Israel to use its 13 kilometres of beach on the Red Sea solely for tourism. (Israel's largest shipping line, Zim, announced in October that it will no longer transport through Eilat; rather all of its ships from the East will sail through the Suez Canal and unload at Ashdod). The Israeli Port Authority has also shelved plans for building a new international airport north of Eilat, as it expects to develop a joint facility with the Jordanians in the near future.

Just days after the London meeting, director-general of Israel's Ministry of Tourism, Eli Gonen, met with a delegation of Jordanian businessmen in Jerusalem, some of whom have investments in Jordanian tourism projects. "I'm sure the Jordanian government was aware of their plans to meet with me," said Gonen. "This gives us confidence in the Jordanian private sector — that they are really interested in peace and we are not just experiencing political gestures."

The discussions focused on developing a riviera on the Red Sea, from Aqaba, along the Israeli coast to Taba in northern Sinai. How to attract cruise ships to the area was also discussed, as well as joint advertising for package travel to the region.

The Jordanian entrepreneurs, said Gonen, were also interested in establishing charter flights between the two countries. Meanwhile, a Jordanian minibus routinely drives across the Allenby Bridge to pick up passengers from Israeli soil, and the United States Agency for International Development (USAID) has just built a super highway from Amman to the bridge.

Getting to Amman from the Jordan River takes 40 minutes and costs about ten dollars. The landscape is similar on both slopes of the shared valley, but on the Jordanian side, signs announce one's arrival at the King Hussein Bridge. A sign on the eastern slope of the Jordan Valley, similar to that found between Jerusalem and the Dead Sea, indicates that one has reached sea level. Just off the road is Mount Nebo, the reputed burial place of Moses, and 20 minutes outside Amman one can still see the three spires of the Mount of Olives and Mount Scopus in Jerusalem.

Amman is a modern city whose wide boulevards accommodate the traffic far better than the streets in most Israeli cities. Mercedes and fancy American cars cruise the capital's streets almost unhindered by traffic lights, and a spacious, low-lying cityscape provides commodious parking.

Benetton, Stefanel, Pizza Hut and Kentucky Fried Chicken outlets with their neon signs are all long-time fixtures in Amman, where 30 per cent of the country's 3.5 million people live. Jordan's per capita income is less than $1,000 a year, and one out of five workers is unemployed, facts that become much clearer just outside Amman, where a third of the population is officially registered as refugees — many still in refugee camps. Most of the remaining population are farmers or live in the urban centres of Zarqa, Jerash and Irbid to the north.

The minority Christian community is considered wealthy. Many study abroad and their material appetites seem similar to those of upper-class urban Americans.

Development projects are already under way to increase the number of hotel rooms in Petra from 400 to 3,200. This Nabatean site is Jordan's most popular tourist destination, since Israelis seem to be attracted to the red-stone city in Harei Adumim (the Red Mountains), south east of the Dead Sea, the biblical home of the Edomites. In fact, since the 1950s, 12 overly-curious Israelis were killed after they crossed the border and attempted to visit Petra. More recently, those caught were arrested and eventually returned to Israel.

Jordan also offers a well-restored 2,000-year-old Roman amphitheatre in the heart of Amman. In Jerash, only a half-hour drive north, ruins of Greek temples to Zeus and Artemis — goddess of wild animals and Apollo's twin sister — can be found. In Madaba, to the south, is the oldest known map of Jerusalem, in the form of a sixth century mosaic floor.

The proximity of Jordan and Israel is sure to strengthen ties between the two countries far faster than political links between Israel and other Arab states. Atalla at the Jordanian Ministry of Tourism is already seriously planning his Israel policy. "I don't want the Cohen family to pack a picnic in Eilat, fill the car up with gas in Israel and drive the 1½ hours to Petra just for the day," says Atalla. "No, let them come and spend a few days, and some money."

TO LIVE IN JERUSALEM

Revered as a holy place, Jerusalem is also a secular city — where people live, work, eat and look for a parking space. How people have done this over the last 150 years, was the subject of a recent exhibition at the Israel Museum. The photo depicts a view of the Temple Mount as seen from a modern home in the Jewish Quarter of Jerusalem's Old City.

TRAVEL TALK

By BILL GLADSTONE

TORONTO —Sparkling azure-turquoise water, waves cresting with foam, smooth beige sand, a dazzlingly hot sun. Welcome to a typical winter's day in Hawaii.

Having donned hats, sunscreen and sunglasses, we are ready to brave — or rather, luxuriate in — the elements. Soon we'll relax on a canopied chaise lounge, maybe order pink lemonades in tall glasses frosty with condensation.

Okay, you noticed the dateline above says Toronto. February is a month for sun-filled fantasies. As a second-generation Torontonian I don't normally object to winter, but this record-breaking cold season is also breaking me. I've developed zero tolerance for sub-zero temperatures and I've had it to my pipik with snow, slush, wind-chill factors and freezing rain. If you're feeling the same, please join me as I indulge in the equivalent of California dreaming on a bitterly cold winter's day.

Where were we? Oh yes, Hawaii. The Waikoloa Resort on the Big Island of Hawaii is a Disneyesque playground in the Pacific. Its three residential towers are linked by sleek monorail trams as well as by boats that wend along picturesque canals. The vast grounds are dotted with squiggly-shaped pools, palm trees, waterfalls, a dolphin compound, a flamingo island, and $2 million worth of museum-calibre art works.

Soak up sun

Everything about this place is superlative, from chandeliers that weigh as much as three elephants to a colossal trellis touted as the world's largest. Gorgeously landscaped, Waikaloa cost $360 million to build but there's no telling what the Hilton Corporation paid when it acquired the spectacular property from the Hyatt Regency chain last November. And who cares? We want only to soak up the sun in this exclusive and costly environment.

Thailand: One day an elephant waded into the swimming pool of the elegant Katathani Resort on the idyllic isle of Phuket. The European hotelier was beside himself with worry.

Summertime brings pregnant clouds from India but only occasionally do they burst with rain. In monsoon season, a powerful undertow eats up the beach sand but a gentle surf spits it back the rest of the year.

Visits to an ancient Buddhist temple, a seaside gypsy encampment, a rickety fishing village set above the water on stilts, and some fanciful rocks known as the James Bond Islands (where a 007 movie was once shot) offer convincing evidence that this part of the world is enticing, mysterious, untamed, different. Even the name of these waters — the Andaman Sea — seems exotic, and their colors change daily.

Bahamas: It's a short hop from Nassau to the green isle of Eleuthera, home of the well-appointed Cotton Bay Club, with cosy cabins along a pristine bay of sugary sand. I can almost taste the warm, moist, salt-sea air whose welcome gusts rustle the palm fronds ever so delicately. Come, let's make tracks along the uncrowded beach. We'll return in time for gourmet dining on an open-air patio, a Cotton Bay Club tradition. Golfers will appreciate the 18-hole championship course.

California: We're standing by the Grecian-style outdoor pool at San Simeon, the Hearst castle built on a hilltop near California's gorgeous Pacific Coast Highway, midway between Los Angeles and San Francisco. In these waters once splashed the cinematic demigods of yesteryear — Charlie Chaplin, Mary Pickford, Douglas Fairbanks, et al — so it's no wonder that swimming is forbidden to mere mortals like you and me. Newspaper mogul William Randolph Hearst onced owned all the land as far as the eye can see, even the distant mountains.

Blue horizon

Beyond the blue horizon northward lies more unbelievable scenery. Tenderly do the majestic mountains embrace the faithful sea as we drive along this unique ribbon of road, the radio tuned to the meditation channel. In the flat grape country outside Salinas, we discuss the late great local writer John Steinbeck with strangers in a donut shop. Soon we'll approach San Francisco's famed Golden Gate.

Israel: Actually, we've come not to the Israeli sun destination of Eilat, but to its forbidden twin city of Aqaba. Both share the same fine beach sand and luscious sun. Both share the same coral-rich waters of the Red Sea, which are renowned for superlative scuba diving. Some evenings as the sun sets over Egypt, the waters turn red: hence their name. At the seaside bar of the Aqaba Holiday Inn, the bartender, a Coptic Christian from Egypt, looks longingly westward — towards Eilat, where the nightlife is far more vibrant and the hotels meet international standards of excellence.

This nook between Asia and Africa is so enticing that Jordan's King Hussein has a palace on the beach. Last year, one of the royal horses broke free and bounded into Israel, enjoying the hospitality of the Hebrews until its cordial return to the Hashemites. If peace negotiations bear fruit, human beings may also freely cross this border one day. That's something else to fantasize about on a cold February day.

Vietnam full of paradoxes

By PHYLLIS KRASILOVSKY

VIETNAM — Vietnam is one of the oldest countries in the world, going back 2,000 years, but half its people are under 30. Old country, new people. Vietnam is full of such paradoxes.

A rusting, wingless helicopter sits in the padlocked U.S. Embassy yard in Ho Chi Minh City. Youngsters peddle T-shirts with logos like "Stop the U.S. Embargo" and "Miss Saigon". Beggar children lick chocolate down to the tin foil outside the luxurious Continental Hotel in Saigon.

There's a definite personality difference between North and South Vietnamese, obvious even to tourists. Southerners are more talkative and outgoing than their reticent northern neighbors. Both are friendly to Americans.

If one settles down on a museum or park bench, smiling young people appear eager to practice their English. A tour guide asks if anyone has spare magazines or books. He doubles as a Grade 5 teacher, but his students have few reading English materials. Youngsters of 12 or 13 work as interpreters for business delegations. The English language is in the hands of the young.

The beauty of the Vietnamese countryside and the vibrancy of its cities have not been demolished by its wars. There's much to see and learn in all regions. Ha Long Bay is an ecological highlight, an untouted wonder of the world. Like castles rising from the sea, more than 3,000 stone formations dot the bay. Ramshackle sampans, whose owners offer cabbage-like coral for sale, float between them. It's easy to see animals profiles in some of the shapes. They could be Easter Island figures, a sculpture garden of the sea.

After such surrealism, one can see the old and new juxtaposed during a sail down the Boch Dang River towards Haiphong. One bank is home to a massive shipping industry, with rusty iron ships, cranes and yellow cement warehouses. On the other side lie placid rice farms. Silhouettes of willow trees and the distant mountains frame picture after picture of pastoral serenity.

This paradox of feudal and modern exists outside of Ho Chi Minh City as well. Men and oxen plow muddy fields while women in conical hats, their faces protected from sunburn by sweltering bands of cloth, gather up wheat sheaves. Inside the city people whiz by on motor bikes.

Saigon immediately impresses with its size, French Colonial architecture and ubiquitous clamor. More than 4.5 million people live there, and every day hundreds line up at the beautiful main post office to mail letters and make phone calls. The antiquated communications systems makes for benches filled with resigned-looking callers awaiting their turn.

The Reunification Palace, formerly the presidential palace, has a haute dictator feeling with its billiard room, ballroom, receiving and conference rooms, theatre, etc. On the roof is a helicopter pad and sunning garden. In the basement are extensive war rooms and an impressive communications centre. Outside magnificent lawns and flowers are on all sides. Beyond the huge iron gate is the cacophony of Saigon traffic.

In Hanoi is the Ho Chi Minh Mausoleum, which matches Lenin's Tomb for pomp and splendor. Here too you can see the late leader "in person." A happier attraction is the water puppet theatre, where puppeteers stage hilarious fish fights, gun battles and wedding processions, complete with smoking cannons. The singing of a live costumed troupe is similar to Chinese opera.

A chilling sight is the memorial site behind the Hue Fortress. The overgrown field was the site of the harshest Tet offensive in 1968. Artillery shells and other ammunition were once stored underground.

In DaNang one can swim at the famous China Beach, wider than Jones Beach, and filled with friendly bathers. Down the road, the largest Buddha in the country sits on Marble Mountain. The views are stupendous. Another beautiful beach is in Nha Trang. Non-swimmers can recline on beach chairs under the palms for just pennies.

Far from the horrors of the Vietnam War, Westerners are free once again to explore the charms of the country and its people.

Note: Until sanitary conditions improve in public places and toilets, touring by ship is strongly recommended. First-class hotels are still sparse, air-conditioning is mostly nil, and bottled water is essential.

Greece's Jewish museum

In the 15th century Spanish and Portuguese Jews were invited to take refuge in the Ottoman Empire at the invitation of Sultan Beyazit II.

They were called Sephardim and settled in cities such as Thessaloniki, Edirne and Izmir. By 1910 Thessaloniki had a Jewish population of approximately 65,000, which was half of its entire inhabitants.

The Jewish Museum of Greece is open to the public and funded and manned by the Friends Of The Jewish Museum, active in Greece and abroad. A quarterly newsletter is sent to its members. It is located at 36 Queen Amalias Ave., GR-105 58, Athens.

Logical Solutions

By LORI DENNIS
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — As computer skills become more essential to remaining competitive in today's job market, an increasing number of computer training courses are being designed to help bring our generation up to speed.

Michael Noar, founder of Logical Solutions, a company that specializes in training people in some of today's most widely accepted business software, thinks that the key to successful computer training is to find an instructor that is low-key, patient and offers instruction in the comfort of the student's home or office.

"People are nonplussed by computers. They have this gigantic fear. But with just a little bit of instruction and encouragement, their fears can easily be overcome. When they are learning in a familiar environment, they are far more relaxed and better able to grasp the concepts. And when they are taught directly on their own computer, the instruction is far more effective because they can personalize their computer set-up," he believes.

For a fee of $40 per hour, for an average stretch of four to eight hours, Noar says he can have anyone up and running on their own computer, familiarizing them with just about any software package on the market today. From Maximizer for Windows, Q & A Write and Q & A Database to Winfax Pro, Aldus PageMaker and Fastback, Noar helps his clients, who range in age from 8 to 72, upgrade their skills and ultimately puts them at ease with any new technology.

"Most computers are being terribly underutilized which is a shame. It amazes most of my students just how much power their computers have and how little of it they are actually using because of lack of awareness or understanding," he explains.

"The reason most people seek my help is that their time is too valuable [for] searching through and trying to decipher 200-page instruction manuals. What would normally take four to five days to figure out on their own, I can teach my students in ½ hour or less."

Tips From Pros

By BARRY CORBIN
Special to The CJN

Resolving financial disputes between two parties when there are underlying personal conflicts is a difficult proposition at the best of times.

It is for this reason that the resolution of matrimonial disputes is often a protracted and expensive legal exercise. But if one concedes top spot to matrimonial disputes in this regard, there is little doubt that running a clear second are estate disputes. Indeed, the rancour exhibited by litigants in an estate dispute is often fuelled as much by emotional concerns — anger and jealousy being at the top of the list — as by financial ones.

This dual agenda — one personal, the other financial — is also the reason why parties to a matrimonial dispute are often prepared to try mediation, either as an alternative or as an adjunct to litigation. And yet, this is rarely tried in estate disputes. Why? Before suggesting an answer, a few comments on mediation as a method of dispute resolution are offered here.

Mediation (which is just one of a whole range of methods usually grouped under the umbrella term, "alternative dispute resolution") seeks to resolve issues in dispute through "interest-based" rather than "position-based" negotiation. The objective for the mediator is to understand the "why" rather than the "what" which drives each party. By encouraging each of the parties to put on the table (at least for the mediator, if not for the other party) the real reason for his or her position on the issues in dispute, the mediator seeks to help the parties in fashioning their own resolution of the issues.

By contrast, in litigation each party hides his or her real agenda. Communication between the lawyers is limited to a cold recitation of facts (at least, the facts as the client perceives them and as the lawyer chooses to describe them) coupled with a list of aggressive demands.

To pose the question again: why is mediation frequently tried in matrimonial disputes, but rarely in estate disputes? One factor stands out among others as a possible explanation: a fundamental difference between the way the courts deal with matrimonial disputes and the way they deal with estate disputes.

The unsuccessful party in a matrimonial dispute will normally be penalized in costs. That is, in addition to having to pay all of his or her own legal costs, the losing party will be ordered by the court to pay a significant portion of the legal costs of the successful party. However, in estate litigation each party expects to be indemnified in full out of the estate for his or her legal costs.

There would appear, then, to be a strong incentive on both sides to settle matrimonial disputes outside the courtroom, at least where the facts or the law do not so clearly favor one side or the other. By contrast, if each party to an estate dispute expects the court to order full indemnification out of the estate for his or her legal costs, the perceived risk of litigation is diminished, as is the inclination to settle out of court.

Of course, there are other reasons why mediation of estate disputes is uncommon. But those other reasons are not unique to estate disputes. Rather, they relate to resistance in general to mediation as an alternative means of dispute resolution.

Admittedly, in some cases, it can be more difficult to mediate estate disputes than to mediate matrimonial disputes. In matrimonial disputes, there tend to be only two parties before the courts (although where children are involved, there are other parties with an interest in the outcome). In estate disputes, there can be a multitude of issues and, for each issue, a number of parties on each side. Furthermore, there may be more than two sides to an issue. For example, there may be two or three possible interpretations of an ambigious clause in the deceased person's will, each one favoring one person or group of persons over another. Nonetheless, a skilled mediator can deal with multi-party disputes as effectively as with two-party disputes.

Effective mediation

What does mediation offer the parties to an estate dispute? A great many things. First and foremost, mediation offers the parties confidentiality. Where an estate dispute is settled by a court, evidence relevant to the issues in dispute may consist of embarrassing personal information, perhaps about the deceased or about his or her relationships with other family members. (The litigation involving the estate of the late Harold Ballard is a recent example.) In mediation, such information need not enter the public domain.

Effective mediation also has the potential to offer the parties significant cost savings. The mediator's fees will be an additional expense to the disputants, over and above legal and other professional fees, but an effective mediator can eliminate one or more contentious issues which would otherwise occupy many hours of lawyer's time, including legal research, preparation for trial and the conduct of the trial itself.

Multiplying that time and expense by the number of parties who are separately represented by counsel (and there are frequently three or more such parties) quickly demonstrates how mediation can save thousands of dollars in legal and other professional fees. And where such costs are kept down, the pie to be shared is that much bigger, with the likely result that more options can be generated for resolving the dispute.

As a final comment on costs, the following caveat is offered. There are a number of well-recognized exceptions to the general rule of full indemnity from the estate for all parties to the estate dispute. Furthermore, there is a growing tendency for the courts to expand on those exceptions. Nowadays, the person who intends to engage in estate litigation cannot afford to be too smug about the risk of losing in court.

Reasonable alternatives to litigation can be expected to attract more interest as time goes on. The costs and risks entailed in such litigation continue to rise, as will the number of estates to be dealt with following the greying of our population. The "win-win" nature of mediation makes it the alternative with the brightest future in resolving estate disputes.

Kosher vodka producers plan exports to North America

By MIRIAM WIDMAN
Special to The CJN

BERLIN — Have a hankering for some kosher vodka?

Within a year, vodka drinkers in North America will be able to order a kosher version of the drink, manufactured in, of all places, the former East Germany.

The Nissenbaums, a western German Jewish family that has made kosher vodka a necessity in Poland, has now begun producing the drink in Germany.

The family plans to begin exporting its kosher vodkas to the United States and Canada in 1995. This year, the family is concentrating on expanding its presence in Germany and western Europe.

Along with four varieties of kosher vodka, the family produces two after-dinner liqueurs and is planning to produce a line of kosher-for-Passover vodkas.

The drink is made at the former Communist government-owned Absthof spirits factory, which the Nissenbaums, together with a senior manager at the plant, took over after industry was privatized in the former East Germany.

So what is not kosher about other brands of vodka?

Gideon Nissenbaum, a part owner of the factory, said other distilleries make vodka from mixed grains and do not take the special hygienic precautions required for making kosher vodka. Additionally, the Nissenbaums only use kosher yeast.

Nissenbaum said several factories use yeast from animal fat. All bottles of the Nissenbaum kosher vodka carry a seal of kashrut approval signed by Rabbi D. Weisz of the Orthodox Rabbinate in Berlin.

The Nissenbaums make four brands of kosher vodka. One of them — Anatevka, which is made from wheat — is the best-known brand here, possibly because the Broadway musical Fiddler on the Roof goes in this country by the name of the village where the story takes place.

There is another brand known as Jon Teff, pronounced like the Yiddish form of Yom Tov (holiday) but which most Germans pronounce like John Teff, as though it were somebody's name. This brand is made from potatoes and topped off with buffalo grass, a grain that grows between the Polish-Russian border.

The company also makes a Chanukah vodka, which is made from potatoes and topped off with herbs.

These vodkas all contain 40 per cent alcohol. But if that is too weak for your tastes, try the Purim version, which contains 50 percent alcohol.

All the Nissenbaum vodkas have a small brochure attached explaining the significance behind the names.

"We want to make Jewish culture known via vodka," said Gideon Nissenbaum.

The Nissenbaums, although not big vodka drinkers themselves, have experience in the business. Gideon's father, Zygmunt, is a well-known member of the German Jewish community.

During the 1980s he established the Family Nissenbaum Foundation in Poland to preserve Jewish cultural treasures there, particularly Jewish cemeteries.

To keep the foundation running, he set up a joint venture with Poland's former Communist government, which operated a distillery business.

After much research, Gideon Nissenbaum stumbled upon an old Polish recipe for kosher vodka. The drink soon became an astounding success, and many non-Jewish Poles became convinced it was the only way to go.

Soon, several competing kosher vodka labels were on the Polish market. After the fall of the Berlin Wall in 1989, the Nissenbaum family met with the Treuhandanstalt, the German government privatizing agency, to discuss expanding production to Germany.

The family chose the Absthof Distillery because of its long history of producing spirits. The rest, as you could say, is hic-story.

A success story

By DEBBIE HELLER

TORONTO — These days it comes as no surprise to hear that another Canadian company is laying off employees or even closing their doors for good. We may not be used to hearing about companies that are succeeding in the '90s . . . but Actionwear is doing just that.

In 1992 the company grossed $2.3 million in sales and in 1993 doubled that figure to $5 million. Actionwear is looking to expand by another 18,000 to 24,000 square feet.

This Canadian-owned and -operated corporate clothing and premium incentive company is the brain child of 33-year-old president Albert Soberano, who started the company eight years ago.

His management team is equally young. As the company expanded, David Lewenberg, 33, came in as a partner and vice-president three years ago. David Bundas, 31, came on board last year as a sales representative and marketing director.

Actionwear produces garments and accessories emblazoned with the client's logo. Clients include Molson's, Yamaha, Oshawa Foods, Bell Canada, Apple Canada and Famous Players.

"The key words in the advertising industry today are 'value added.' This means that a garment carrying a corporate insignia will be seen by the public for as long as people own and wear it," said Bundas.

The dynamic trio have beaten the odds by paying close attention to the changing needs of their clients. According to Lewenberg, companies have not cut promotional spending, instead changing the nature of what they give away.

Actionwear started as the middleman, but grew into a manufacturer with sophisticated silk screening technology and in-house art department.

"We stock blank garments that we import ourselves from all over the world," said Lewenberg. "This allows us to customize logos and at the same time we are very closely affiliated with a Canadian cut-and-sow factory that manufactures goods for us."

Actionwear also recently created a new licensing division. In 1993 it became a sub-licence printer for major league baseball through Woody Sports Inc., and acquired the exclusive distribution rights through Impact Products for the major league baseball association.

Soberano said that while clothing is a big part of his business, the company also does contract printing and promotional catalogues.

"The ad specialty companies we work with often bring their clients to our showroom to show them the various items and merchandise they can order . . . and even though our companies course of action and philosophies are changing, we have to protect the people that have brought us where we are today," said Soberano.

Other people have helped Actionwear grow. "A big key to our success is our employees. They don't punch the clock and say 'It's 5 p.m., time to go home,' " Lewenberg said. "They'll stay late to ensure the merchandise goes out as scheduled."

Beyond the initial training, Noar also offers telephone support whenever a problem arises. Companies like Radio Shack and Future Shop find this a valuable service for their customers who often hesitate to buy computers or software because they aren't aware that this kind of support exists. In fact, Radio Shack has suggested that Noar take a three-day business seminar to learn about two of their top-selling programs — BusinessVision and PowerLAN — so that he can add to his repertoire and act as a support system for their retail customers.

Noar, educated in England, has been working in Canada's computer software market since 1976. While selling software, he saw a tremendous need for computer training when realizing how difficult it was for people to get ongoing support from most computer stores.

"Today, the computer is no longer a luxury; it has become an integral part of the business world. But because a lot of people don't really understand the newer programs, they are needlessly losing great job opportunities." he explains.

"My advice is to experiment with your computer. Spend some time playing with the different features and most of all have fun with it. That's the best way to learn."

BUSINESS BRIEFS

Ex-Editor Heads Palestinian Bank

JERUSALEM — The former editor of the Palestinian newspaper Al-Fajr, published in eastern Jerusalem, has been named to head a new Palestinian banking venture backed by an international consortium.

Hanna Siniora will become the senior officer of the International Palestinian Bank, a co-venture to be established by Bank Leumi in co-operation with a Palestinian, Spanish and Moroccan banking constortium.

The bank, slated to have $40 million in start-up capital, is expected to be an important source for economic development in the territories after the implementation of the Palestinian self-rule accord.

The consortium has requested the approval of the Bank of Israel to to open branches in the Gaza Strip and the West Bank. As part of its backing, Bank Leumi has agreed to train workers and provide computer services for the bank.

A New Business Link

ISRAEL — An organization has been established to merge small and medium-size enterprises in the Mediterranean basin countries.

It will operate under the framework of an international economic congress.

The regional group will include Israel, the Palestinians, Egypt, Jordan, Turkey, Cyprus, Morocco, Tunisia, Greece, Algeria, France, Italy, Spain, Portugal, and perhaps, Syria and Lebanon.

* * *

Middle East Economic Conference

AMMAN — Israel will participate in an economic conference in Amman this April.

At the meeting, regional states will be joined by thousands of investors. Up to 4,000 important economic concerns from developed countries will be addressed. The purpose is to set up future investments in the region.

The conference was announced by Foreign Minister Shimon Peres at a Histadrut Labor Federation central committee meeting. He said that the European Davos organization and the U.S. Council on Foreign Relations are arranging the conference.

* * *

The Economics Of Politics

ISRAEL — Economic contacts are continuing with the Palestinians but nothing will be finalized until the political process is concluded, according to the Finance Minister Avraham Shohat.

He was speaking to leaders of the Labor party.

He said the Israeli economy is already enjoying benefits on account of the not-yet-signed political agreement, due to large investments from abroad. The peace process has already resulted in cuts in the defense budget which accounts for 8 per cent of the GNP, compared to 20 per cent in the 1970s.

The Perfect Partner Handbook

ISRAEL — Even though Israel has become such an attractive investment option, many people are perplexed about where to invest.

To combat this, Israel's Manufacturers Association has assembled a catalogue of potential partnerships with 130 countries.

The handbook, complete with corporate profiles and contact names, covers a wide range of industries and includes giants such as Teva and Tadiran.

Companies listed are seeking strategic partners for financing, marketing, development, data sharing and joint investments.

Expertise to guide prospective Canadian investors is available from Ben Noy, the director of Israel's Economic Mission or economic advisor Gabriel Regev at (416) 961-1242.

Reduced Roles in Banking Business

ISRAEL — Israel is hanging "for sale" signs on companies across the country, including banks, as the government's privatization drive picks-up speed.

By the end of this year, the government will have given up controlling interest in Bank Hapoalim and Bank Leumi. Most available shares will be offered on the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange (TASE) although some could find their way to European and American capital markets.

The finance department predicts $1.5 billion in revenue from privatization this year.

Information for this portion was supplied by Israel's Economic Mission (416) 961-1242.

Vigils for Agunot held in seven Canadian cities

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Sombre vigils were held last Wednesday evening in seven cities across Canada to show solidarity with and draw attention to the plight of agunot — women whose husbands refuse to give them a Jewish divorce (get).

The Vigil for Agunot was organized by the Montreal-based Canadian Coalition of Jewish Women for the Get, which comprises B'nai Brith Women, Emunah Women of Canada, Hadassah-WIZO, Na'amat Canada, Women's Canadian ORT and the Montreal and Toronto Jewish Women's Federations.

Coalition chair Evelyn Brook spoke at the Montreal vigil to about 100 people, mostly women but including some rabbis, gathered in the lobby of the Montreal Jewish federation headquarters. "Too many women are caught in the shackles of the Jewish divorce system," she said. These women depend on each and every one of us. Our survival as a community is tied to our ability to respond to them."

Norma Joseph, leader of the International Coalition for Agunah Rights (ICAR), said, "Unless we address [the agunah issue], we will not be able to talk with our heads held high about Jewish continuity."

She cited several examples of women in Israel who are trapped in relationships with abusive men and treated with indifference — or worse, denounced by the rabbinical courts.

Since 1990 Canada has had a law requiring spouses to remove any barriers to the remarriage of their partners before a civil divorce is granted. But, Joseph noted, it has not been completely effective because many lawyers do not know how to use it. It also has no jurisdiction over a recalcitrant spouse who has left the country, nor does it help agunot who already have civil divorces.

Orthodox Rabbi Mordecai Zeitz was congratulated for taking the lead in Montreal in terms of concrete action on the get issue. The constitution of his synagogue, Congregation Beth Tikvah in Dollard des Ormeaux, stipulates that anyone not participating in the get process cannot be a synagogue member. In addition, anyone stalling on a get is not accorded Torah honors or privileges at Beth Tikvah.

The synagogue has never used the clause, the rabbi said, but its presence alone has acted as a deterrent to recalcitrance in at least a couple of cases.

Rabbi Ira Grussgott of Conservative Congregation Shaar Hashomayim, the largest synagogue in Montreal, told The CJN he intends to propose to the board a similar clause in the Shaar's bylaws.

"Jewish law should never be understood as a force that oppresses. Judaism is synonymous with justice... This is one issue on which Orthodox Judaism feels almost apologetic or ashamed or defensive," he said. Rabbi Grussgott thinks the agunah issue is probably "irremediable" in the sense of finding flexibility in Halachah. "It's the classic dilemma: you want to be true to a system that has ensured Jewish survival, yet you regret injustice."

The Rabbinical Council of Canada, Quebec region, an Orthodox rabbinical group, has insisted for a couple of years that none of its mem-

Hebron slayings stall peace talks

Last week's killing of 39 Palestinians praying at a Hebron mosque by a Jewish settler brought swift condemnations from around the world, including from Prime Minister Jean Chretien.

And although the governments of Syria, Jordan and Lebanon had restricted their initial reactions to the murders to verbal criticisms, by Sunday night, Israel's neighbors had decided on concrete action.

The three countries announced they are breaking off the Washington-based bilateral negotiations with Israel because, according to one U.S. official, "the atmosphere is not right. They wanted things to cool down a bit."

In Ottawa, Chretien issued a statement saying "The government and the people of Canada are appalled by this horrible crime in the West Bank.

"We hope that this senseless act of violence will not impede the historic progress we have seen recently in the Middle East peace process that is fully supported by the government of Canada.

"On behalf of the people of Canada, I extend my sincere condolences to the families of the victims," Chretien's statement said.

The prime minister also wrote to his Israeli counterpart, saying he is "encouraged" that both Israel and the PLO had accepted invitations from U.S. President Bill Clinton for accelerated talks in Washington.

"I encourage you in your efforts to ensure that such extreme acts are not repeated," Chretien wrote to Yitzhak Rabin. "Only then can the hopes engendered by the courageous signing of the Declaration of Principles be realized."

In a letter to PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat, Chretien expressed his "shock and outrage" at the Hebron massacre and said he's looking forward to meeting Arafat when the PLO leader is scheduled to visit Canada later this year.

Noting that the attacker's "likely purpose was to ruin the historic reconciliation now under way between the Palestinians and the Israelis," Clinton called on Israeli and Palestinian negotiators to meet beginning this week in Washington and to keep meeting until they reached an agreement.

In the Middle East, criticism of the killings was matched in some instances by verbal attacks on the Israeli government.

While Egypt, the only Arab country to have a peace treaty with Israel, confined its criticism to the killings, more radical Middle East states, including Syria and Iran, blamed Israeli policies for the massacre.

Egyptian Foreign Minister Amre Moussa said the killings underscored the need to provide security for Palestinians in the territories.

"It stresses the importance of safeguarding Palestinian security and not just Israeli security," said Moussa, who has served as an intermediary in the Israeli-Palestinian negotiations for establishing self-rule in the Gaza Strip and Jericho.

One of the prime stumbling blocks in the negotiations was the continuing Israeli concern for providing security for settlers living in the two areas.

In Jordan, Prime Minister Abdul Salam Al-Majali said, "This criminal act is an obstacle on the road to achieving a just and permanent peace."

Syria, which only recently returned to the negotiating table with Israel, said Israeli leaders were responsible for the incident. Like the Jordanians, the Syrian government viewed the killings as a serious threat to the peace process.

The Lebanese government compared the killings to the Holocaust.

Iran went furthest in its criticisms, saying the killings were "doubtless carried out with the backing of the military forces of the Zionist regime."

Muslim fundamentalist groups, in statements issued from Beirut, Damascus and Cairo, threatened to retaliate swiftly for the killings.

Rabbi Krentzman pleads guilty to multiple charges

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Rabbi Meyer Krentzman has been sentenced to five years' imprisonment after pleading guilty to charges related to drug trafficking, fraud and issuing false declarations.

In exchange for the plea, Crown prosecutor Mario Dufresne agreed to withdraw one of the drug-related charges against Rabbi Krentzman, as well as two charges related to the possession of equipment to produce false passports and of stolen goods. A charge of break-and-enter was replaced by one of conspiracy to commit fraud against an insurance company.

Quebec Court judge Yves Lagace accepted Dufresne's recommendation of a five-year jail term for the drug-related charges. These include: conspiring with Viswanadhan Thamotharampillai and another person to traffic drugs between Nov. 17, 1993 and Jan. 19, 1994; trafficking one gram of cocaine Nov. 17; trafficking one kilo of cocaine for $33,000 Dec. 6; conspiring to sell another kilo Jan. 6; trafficking one gram of heroin Jan. 12, and trafficking 30 grams of heroin Jan. 19 for $3,500. All transactions were with an undercover police officer.

The Crown dropped a charge against Rabbi Krentzman of possession of 81 grams of heroin for the purpose of trafficking.

Rabbi Krentzman, 49, was sentenced to a total of 12 months' imprisonment on the other charges, to be served concurrently with the five-year sentence.

Standing in handcuffs, he looked haggard and dejected as he heard the sentence.

Shul tackles AIDS' grim reality

There are now 14 to 15 million infected with virus worldwide

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The story of AIDS is not about a certain group that has a problem; rather it is a human problem, and the fight against the devastating disease is everyone's responsibility, the members of a recent panel agreed.

The panel, entitled AIDS: Reality and Responsibility, was presented by the continuing education committee of Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am, and its purpose was to raise awareness and understanding of the impact of the AIDS crisis. Panel members included Dr. Philip Berger, physician and AIDS specialist; Kael, an educator and person living with AIDS; Dr. Donna Keystone, HIV primary care specialist and chair of the Holy Blossom Temple AIDS committee; June Callwood, author and founder of Casey House Hospice for AIDS; Eva, a mother who lost her son to the disease; and Rabbi Philip Scheim, spiritual leader of the synagogue. Moderator was Paul Cross of CHUM radio, producer of an award winning documentary on AIDS.

Berger, who praised the committee for being the first to be formed in a Conservative synagogue, explained AIDS medically and said that it is a lifetime infection with no cure. "Our main goal in treating people living with AIDS is to maximize their enjoyment of life.

"There are now 14 to 15 million people worldwide infected with the AIDS virus and by the year 2000, researchers estimate another 20 million will be infected. The majority of cases are from Africa, and the disease is now spreading like wildfire in Asia. In North America the incidence of new infections plateaued in 1989-1990 and the numbers are slowly decreasing, mainly due to public health and safe sex programs.

Dr. Philip Berger

Callwood told the near capacity crowd that there is nothing good one can say about AIDS but stressed that some good things have resulted. "AIDS has driven the palliative care movement. There is now a great interest in home deaths and Casey House came about because we felt people were not getting good care. The palliative care movement has changed home care service and has created free-standing hospices."

She added that the gay movement has developed a sense of pride since it found itself in the middle of a catastrophe and has been able to turn itself into an example of how a community of people can care for itself in a crisis. "They are proud of themselves, and so they should be."

She said that it is absolutely essential to provide explicit sex education in schools. "We have to tell teenagers about safe sex and about latex condoms. We have to talk to our daughters and sons and tell them that unprotected sex can kill them in 10 years. If we love them we must be frank."

Eva, a Holocaust survivor who lost her first-born son to AIDS, choked back tears and talked about the daily struggles during her son's illness. "We learned that by loving him we would not get AIDS, so we loved him a lot. The power of love and caring lengthened his life considerably and he died with dignity at home, surrounded by family and his favorite nurse."

She said, however, that at that time, in the late 1980s, she found little support within the Jewish community. "We knew other Jewish families and we figured we could help and support each other, but apart from the then newly formed Holy Blossom Temple AIDS committee, there was no other support. I could not find a support group with other mothers."

She said that she joined the panel because she wanted people to understand the need for help. "In the past, AIDS was not considered a Jewish issue. It is not only a Jewish issue, it is everyone's issue. We have to have it in our hearts to be compassionate, caring human beings. Every illness is devastating but AIDS is especially so because a majority of its victims are children and young men and women. It is a lonely disease and many of its victims are abandoned."

She conceded that with hospices and bereavement groups, times are now changing and she praised Holy Blossom for its work. "It is greatly appreciated by families like ours. We have made strides in the right direction but there is still work to be done. By speaking here, I hope to reach out and help others."

Kael, who has lived with AIDS for nine years, said that in having AIDS, he has learned to face life "and I have also learned to face death. I am not ashamed and I do not want to hide or shield others. I do not want to go to another Jewish funeral that denies what that person was. AIDS is also a Jewish issue. Lots and lots of Jewish people are not just affected by AIDS but are infected and we all need each other."

He echoed Callwood, saying that AIDS is not a blessing "but some wonderful things have come about as a result. I met my very best friend in life through Holy Blossom's committee and I have encountered some incredible people. I wish it didn't take AIDS for us to have met."

In a question about assisted suicide for people with AIDS, Callwood replied that 500 people have died at Casey House in six years and none of the deaths were assisted. "What they had of their life was made pain-free until life was over. I hope that is the way we can see one another out."

Berger said he "mostly but not completely" agrees with Callwood. "Even some of the best palliative care does not satisfy some patients. There is no safeguard and no accountability against assisted suicide. It goes on, and it goes on regularly."

Discussing Holy Blossom's AIDS committee, Keystone said that it evolved because of some very dedicated volunteers. She described some of its services including AIDS assist, which trains volunteers to become buddies to people with AIDS. Since its inception, it has served 40 infected people, both Jews and non-Jews. As well, there are three ongoing support groups and an annual seder, for which this year, they expect about 130 people. "Our goal is to make a difference in one person's life and we would like to see an AIDS committee in every synagogue. Thank you Beth David for helping make my dream come true."

Rabbi Scheim said that during the week prior to Purim, the week of zachor, it is time to remember those who have threatened us in our history. Tonight we remember those who have fallen victims and have suffered the effects of illness and society's ignorance. The courage that has filled the sanctuary tonight will be remembered by all of us for a long time."

Ottawa school board sets guidelines on teaching The Merchant of Venice

By MIRIAM SOBEL
CJN Correspondent

OTTAWA — Shakespeare's play about a Jewish moneylender will no longer be taught in the younger high school grades in Ottawa Board of Education schools. Following the example of boards such as Peel Region, Wellington and Waterloo county, the Merchant of Venice will only be offered to students from Grade 11 to OAC.

The decision followed discussions with representatives from the Jewish Community Council (JCC) of Ottawa. Ruth Kahane, director of community relations for the JCC said the school board was approached after two Jewish students complained that the play was being handled in a way that was insensitive to Jews. One student was asked on an exam to defend the statement that Shylock the moneylender "became a tragic character because of his idle wish, his blind greed and his hatred of Christians." The student argued against the statement and was given a failing mark. Another student had non-Jewish friends spinning in their seats during class to ask if all Jews were greedy.

The position of the JCC was that students in Grades 9 and 10, the level at which the play has usually been taught, were relatively immature, and that exposure to negative anti-Semitic stereotypes could leave a lasting impression on them, expecially if they didn't know any Jewish people. Ron Singer, chair of the public affairs committee of the JCC said the intention was not to have the play removed from the curriculum. It was felt, however, that it was more appropriately taught in the senior grades, he said, when students have the maturity to recognize bias in literature.

Phyllis Paryas, English language arts co-ordinator at the Ottawa Board of Education, says the play will now be offered only in the senior grades. English department heads in schools which decide to include The Merchant of Venice on their curriculum, will be asked to read a background paper, prepared by three academics in the Ottawa Jewish community, that lists their concerns and provides background information for teachers. For instance, the paper says that Shakespeare had likely never met a Jew, since Jews had been expelled from England in the 13th century, but had probably borrowed the stereotype from a 14th century Italian story, which was written at a time of extreme religious intolerance. And it explains that money lending was often the only profession available to Jews.

Teachers will also be supplied with additional resources, which the JCC is helping to prepare.

"Our purpose is to make sure that the play is taught thoughtfully," said Paryas.

She said the review of the play was timely because the school board is taking a look at all their material to make sure it conforms to the new Government of Ontario equity guidelines. Those guidelines, she adds, do not ban books; they require school boards to teach students to explore and recognize examples of bias.

The neighboring Carleton Board of Education, which runs suburban and rural schools in the Ottawa area, is also reviewing its position on The Merchant of Venice. Dan Mason, the principal of education services for the Carleton Board said he has met with the JCC's Kahane and has contacted the English department heads in the schools.

The play is currently being taught in a few Grade 10 classes in the Carleton Board (Shakespearean plays were removed from the Grade 9 curriculum when that grade was destreamed last autumn), said Mason, a former English teacher, and he has had no complaints about it from either students or parents.

"I know when I taught it, I taught that Shylock was the victim, which he is," said Mason.

He expects a decision about the teaching of the play by September 1994.

Ukrainian Jews choosing Toronto as their new home

TORONTO — Jewish Agency statistics recently released to United Jewish Appeal offices show more aliyah from Ukraine than ever before. A larger number of Ukraine Jews are choosing Toronto as well.

Since last August, approximately 1,500 Jews have left Ukraine for Israel every month. In a recent report, Dr. Baruch Gur, who directs Jewish Agency activities in the former Soviet Union, predicts a continuation of the trend. He cites "a grave economic crisis and political instability."

"The situation will worsen," he forecasts, "before and after the elections which are scheduled for March, 1994."

Although Gur forsees a faster rate of aliyah from the Caucasus region of the former Soviet Union, immigration to Toronto from that area is miniscule.

Pollard called 'scapegoat' for Ames' pro-Soviet spying

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jonathan Pollard, who is serving a life sentence in the U.S. for passing secrets to Israel, has been the "scapegoat" for the misdeeds of Aldrich Hazen Ames, Pollard's Toronto-based fiancee contended last week.

Ames, a 31-year Central Intelligence Agency employee, and his wife Maria, were arrested late last month on charges they spied for the Soviet Union and later Russia.

"Jonathon has been scapegoated," Elaine Zeitz told The CJN last week. "He never intended to hurt the United States," whereas Ames spied for an enemy.

Ames, 52, was chief of the Soviet branch of the CIA's counter-intelligence group and in a position to pass top-secret matters to the Soviets and Russians. He's accused of placing those secrets in "dead drops" in and around Washington for pick-up by the KGB.

The Russians reportedly paid the double-agent $1.5 million over the past nine years. American officials say at least two Soviets were executed as U.S. spies because of the information Ames sold.

President Bill Clinton, who has been kept informed of the matter for the past 10 months, called the case "serious."

Passed test

Late last year, in arguments against commuting Pollard's sentence to time already served, some intelligence officials claimed that information he passed to Israel may have inadvertently found its way to the Soviet Union.

"Now we know who really did it," said Zeitz, Pollard's Canadian spokeswoman, referring to Ames.

Pollard even passed a lie detector test on whether he passed secrets to the Soviets and intelligence officials were satisfied with the test rests, Zeitz said.

While Pollard has said he would "rather be rotting in prison" than withhold information that can save Israeli lives, U.S. government sources say Ames's motivation seemed purely financial.

Late last week, White House press secretary Dee Dee Myers said, "I don't think there's any connection" between the Pollard and Ames cases.

Zeitz, who speaks to Pollard daily, said there's no official connection between him and Ames. She said Pollard was "shocked" to learn of the details of the Ames case.

Ames worked on Soviet counter-intelligence at least from 1983 to 1985. Pollard was jailed in 1985 and pleaded guilty to passing classified information to an ally in 1987.

Reform Party expels racist member

OTTAWA — The Reform Party of Canada has again admitted, then expelled, an ex-convict with links to racist and neo-Nazi groups.

The party last week kicked out Armand Siksna after it was tipped off about his past, which includes being sentenced to six years in prison for conspiring to murder an associate.

Siksna and Alexander McQuirter, former head of the Canadian branch of the Ku Klux Klan, received the convictions in 1983. McQuirter was handed an eight-year jail sentence.

Siksna's application was routinely processed by Reform's Calgary headquarters in January, a party spokesman said last week. Included was the standard $10 membership fee.

Siksna applied to the Beaches-Woodbine riding association, which was told it had a new member. Someone at the riding level evidently alerted party headquarters.

Reform expelled Siskna two days after the Toronto Sun carried a report that he had joined the party.

In 1973, Siksna was one of two men charged under the first prosecution ever under Canada's hate laws. The two were acquitted of spreading anti-Semitic and anti-black propaganda.

The Reform Party has been dogged for years by accusations that it is a haven for racists and anti-Semitic extremists.

Two years ago, the party expelled four avowed white supremacists in Toronto, including Heritage Front leader Wolfgang Droege, as well as the party member who recruited them.

The member, Al Overfield, was active in Reform's Beaches-Woodbine riding association, the same riding association Siksna had joined.

Reform issued a statement last week suggesting that racists have infiltrated the party in an effort "to embarrass Reformers or seek publicity for their cause. These individuals are not welcome in the party and we hope they will get the message loud and clear."

Soviet family faces more misfortune

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Misfortune has again struck a Jewish family of four facing deportation to North Ossetia in the former Soviet Union.

Zalina Roth, 25, a member of the family, and her husband, Gera, lost a baby, born prematurely on Feb. 18. The male child, Allan, was buried Feb. 23.

As a result, an inquiry into the deportation, scheduled for resumption Feb. 22, was put forward to March 23.

Those facing deportation are Felix Gogniev, 56, his ex-wife, Dina Tsallaeva, and daughters, Tima Gogniev, 27, and Zalina, who is married to a Canadian Jew, but still faces deportation.

Felix Gogniev was also absent from the Feb. 22 inquiry hearing because of knee surgery following a fall that aggravated injuries from an earlier severe fall last September.

The Gognievs, who have been in Canada for three years on visitors visas, claim they face persecution and discrimination if they are sent back to North Ossetia, a region on the border of Georgia, where ethnic rivalries have led to civil war and anti-Semitism. An Immigration and Refugee Board ruled that there was no evidence that the Gognievs would be harmed and ordered their deportation.

When she postponed the inquiry to March 23, adjudicator Sylvanna Gratton of the Immigration Department said that at that time she will give her decision on whether she would step down from the case because of the apprehension of bias against welfare recipients as alleged by counsel Christine Kurawata.

At the hearing, sympathy was extended to the Gogniev family by the adjudicator and by Vince Greco, representing the Department of Immigration.

Montreal Jewish community 'in shock' over rabbi's arrest

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — What does a traditional, close-knit Jewish community do when a well-known rabbi is charged with crimes, especially something so odious as drug-dealing?

The Montreal Jewish community has been repeatedly described as "in shock" over the cases of Rabbi Meyer Krentzman (who has just pleaded guilty to a number of charges and been sentenced to five years in prison) and another person who is still facing charges. But is that shock due to the fact that an individual with smicha allegedly flouted the ethics his position represents or to a fear that the behavior of those involved will reflect on the community as a whole?

The administration of Beth Zion, including its rabbi, Sidney Shoham, will not speak to the media about the affair. Rabbi Shoham, who returned to Montreal from Florida almost two weeks after the dramatic arrests — broadcast on a French-language television station — of Krentzman and two others on Jan. 19, is referring journalists' questions to Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) or B'nai Brith.

"It's not a synagogue matter," he told The CJN. Rabbi Krentzman, ordained by Montreal Chief Rabbi Pinchas Hirschprung, conducted the High Holy Day services held in the social hall at Beth Zion in 1991 and 1992, and prayed there regularly, but he was not an employee or official of the synagogue.

Rabbi Shoham did say that he has, from the pulpit, called on the congregation to treat with "sensitivity" the families of those involved.

However, Yechiel Glustein, chair of the Beth Zion religious committee, confirmed that the synagogue is not behind the fundraising for the Krentzman family. The couple have five children.

"Let's put it this way, nobody approached me."

Rabbi Yonah Rosner told The CJN a substantial sum of money has been raised among individuals in the community for the Krentzmans.

One contributor is Len Rosen, who said he gave because he knew the Krentzmans and wanted to help. "Whatever happens to him, the family is not guilty."

CJC Quebec region executive director Michael Crelinsten said CJC is speaking on behalf of the community on the matter because Beth Zion felt inquiries "should be handled by someone else" to avoid any association between the congregation and the case.

Crelinsten agrees that the community's reaction went beyond shock to "concern that it reflects on the community as a whole.

"But fairly quickly I think it was realized that this is the alleged act of two individuals, and there is no reason for us to be tainted by association. I haven't seen any hint of that."

Crelinsten describes this reaction as "indicative of the [community's] collective commitment to certain ethical behavior and a reflection of just how tight-knit we are."

May lead to 'heightened scrutiny'

Rabbi Reuben Poupko, of Beth Israel Beth Aaron Congregation in Cote St. Luc (where Rabbi Krentzman was part-time rabbi over a decade ago), is more blunt. "I reject the self-imposed collective guilt that I sense a large part of the community has assumed. I don't believe we live in a society that is so unsophisticated it would condemn a whole community. Certainly, there is no evidence that has happened."

Taking the broader perspective, Rabbi Poupko thinks this episode may lead to "heightened scrutiny" of the rabbinate and generally more scepticism about who is entrusted with community responsibility.

Rabbi Krentzman and the other Jew still facing charges have received regular visits from provincial prison chaplain Rabbi Zushe Silberstein.

He said he has arranged for them to kosher food, prayer books, tallesim and tefillin. Prisoners are not normally allowed to have phylacteries, Rabbi Silberstein said, but he was able to persuade the authorities of their necessity in this case.

Tefillin, which have long leather straps, are normally prohibited — as are belts — because of the risk of suicide.

Rabbi Silberstein, a Lubavitcher, said he visited the men nearly every-day in the first couple of weeks of their incarceration and now is going at least weekly. As chaplain, he is permitted to visit with them face-to-face at any time.

At time of writing, he was still trying to get permission for the two men to have wine or grape juice so they can make kiddush on Shabbat, and to bring in a minyan for yahrzheit.

"They have not been forgotten [by the community]. A number of rabbis and individuals have offered to help them and their families. I've received continuous phone calls, not just out of curiosity, but from people who want to do something," Rabbi Silberstein said.

Rabbi Krentzman's counsel, Raphael Schachter, one of the top criminal lawyers in Montreal who has defended many high-profile personalities, told The CJN he took the case, against the advice of some, because of its tragic element.

"This is a human tragedy of monumental proportions . . . I refuse to abandon this man at the lowest point of his life. I will continue to do my best for him."

Schachter, who noted that he is the grandson of a rabbi, would not say if he had taken on the case pro bono (without charge), but stressed there is no "financial consideration."

"From experience — and I probably have more faults than most — I can say 'But for the grace of God goes anybody.' "

Students view Schindler's List

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Philip Weiss has taken to heart the responsibility for educating the younger generation about the horrors of the Holocaust.

For years, the Winnipeg businessman and former chair of the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council's Holocaust remembrance committee has been speaking to Winnipeg high school students about the Holocaust and against Nazism and racism.

Continuing with this policy, Weiss has rented the Grant Park Theatre in south Winnipeg for a special free Sunday morning showing of Schindler's List for up to 250 Grade 11 and 12 students from around the city.

Weiss was interned in Plasz'w, the camp portrayed in the Spielberg movie from June 1944 until early 1945, working as a groundskeeper and tailor. He remembers the camp commandant, Amon Goethe, as a madman who shot people from his balcony as a form of recreation.

Since the film opened in Winnipeg, Weiss has found himself to be much in demand for media interviews.

"I was thinking what I could do for people and students to acquaint them more with the facts of the Holocaust in light of the Spielberg movie and all the awards it is receiving," he says. "I thought this was a tremendous opportunity. I decided to rent the theatre and show the students the movie without charge. I'm not wealthy but I feel I have an obligation."

Weiss approached ten schools around the city, including Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate (the Jewish high school) with his invitation. All were eager to participate, he reports.

Weiss also attended the screening. He wanted to see the students' reaction when the film ended.

Rabbi calls for activism on agunah issue

bers perform marriages unless the bride and groom have signed a standard prenuptial agreement stating that, should the mariage fail, they will complete the get.

Rabbi Martin Penn of Montreal's Congregation Shomrim Laboker said such an agreement is intended as a preventive measure and has yet to be tested as a binding contract in the civil courts.

His Orthodox synagogue also plans to exclude from its membership any recalcitrant spouses, but Rabbi Penn says this is a "symbolic act," because to the best of his knowledge there have not been any cases within his congregation.

"The way to deal with this issue is through community activism. We cannot change Halachah, but we can do other things," said Rabbi Penn.

Zave Climan, one of the few men present at the vigil who is not a rabbi, came because "I have two daughters and hope this will never happen to them."

The week before the vigil, Baron de Hirsch Institute of Montreal's Federation CJA announced it is forming a support group and confidential service for agunot.

"We look to the day when a climate exists that agunot can come forward and feel secure enough to tell their stories," Joseph said.

• • •

At Toronto's Jewish Community Centre, an agunah now living in Canada, who has a civil divorce, told her story to a group of about three dozen people who had braved high winds and snowy roads on a night when many other community events were cancelled.

"Although I am told that my exhusband cannot be coerced [into giving the get], I feel that women like myself are coerced, forced to make concessions, compromises, sometimes with visitation, sometimes monetarily, in order to receive freedom. I want to get free, to get on with my life," she told The CJN following the vigil.

The number of Canadian agunot is not known, although a B'nai Brith Canada study reported that there were 311 known Canadian cases involving conflict or disagreement over a get between 1982 and 1985. Israel has an estimated 10,000 agunot.

There were at least two agunot in addition to the speaker at the Toronto vigil. No rabbis were present.

One of the few men at the Toronto vigil was Martin Lockshin, an associate professor of Religious Studies and Humanities at York University. He said that although he had no personal reason for attending, the plight of agunot is "an issue in Jewish law that bothers me a lot."

• • •

Winter storms affected the vigils in both Ottawa and Hamilton, as well as in Toronto. About 20 women braved a snowstorm and dangerously slick roads in Ottawa to attend the vigil at City Hall, while in Hamilton the vigil was rescheduled for March 13.

One of the communities that was not able to hold a vigil because of time constraints, responded by taking a different type of action. The Today's Woman chapter of Hadassah-WIZO in Victoria, B.C., circulated a petition that they have forwarded to the Coalition for them to use in their fight to help agunot, Brook told The CJN on Monday .

Lawyer Sharon Gray, speaking at the Ottawa vigil, said it is a disgrace that rabbinical courts have tolerated get abuse instead of looking to Jewish law for solutions. "It is pretty terrible when the religious authorities have been complicit in this abuse," Gray said.

At Edmonton's city hall, social worker Sari Friedman-Rosner urged those in attendance to challenge their rabbis to work to prevent future agunot. Homes and businesses of men withholding a get should be picketed.

Halachic solution

In informal discussions following the vigil, Rabbi Jacob Rosner of Beth Shalom, a Conservative synagogue, expressed his support for agunah rights, adding that a halachic solution must be found. Rabbi Rosner was the only rabbi present at the Edmonton vigil.

Rabbi Phillip Bregman of Temple Shalom, a Reform congregation, was the principal speaker at the Vancouver vigil, held in the library of the Talmud Torah. He explained the procedure required to obtain a get and answered questions about Judaic tradition in this regard.

Although the Vancouver turnout was the smallest with only about a dozen women, vigil organizer Dani Mate of Na'amat Canada said it was a worthwhile "educational evening." She noted that there were a number of conflicting meetings that evening, but added that representatives were present from several women's organizations.

"We all agreed that this was a topic that should be explored further and that another meeting be held in the future," she said.

Betty Singer, president of B'nai Brith Women of Canada, Winnipeg region, called for pressure to be brought to bear on the rabbis and lay people of the Jewish community for change. Speaking for the coalition, she called for uncooperative husbands to be ostracized, to be identified publicly in the Jewish press, to be denied community awards, recognition and synagogue honors, and for rabbinic authorities to find immediate solutions for outstanding agunah cases. She also called for pre-nuptial agreements, which are becoming a standard practice in the Conservative movement.

Phyllis Spigelman, section president for the Winnipeg region of the National Council of Jewish Women of Canada, outlined the story of Malka Avivi, an Israeli woman who succeeded in getting a get from her abusive husband only after 34 years of trying, despite the fact the couple were not living together for much of that time and that the husband on several occasions tried to take a second wife.

"The only way to know of this abuse of women is to expose it," said Sheva Medjuck in Halifax. Medjuck, a vice-president of Atlantic Jewish Council and a sociology professor at Mount St. Vincent University, organized the Halifax vigil which took place at Beth Israel Synagogue.

Medjuck was pleased with the turnout of 35 women and five men, representing a broad spectrum of the Jewish community. "Even though we are a small community, we want to help bring freedom to agunot," she said.

Devorah Grafstein, wife of Rabbi Shlomo Grafstein of Beth Israel, an Orthodox synagogue, presented ICAR's prayer for agunot, which was read across the country. Rabbi Pamela Hoffman of Shaar Shalom Congregation (Conservative) closed the vigil with a reading.

Murray Schwartz, former co-chair of the Canadian Jewish Congress Small Communities Committee, said he attended to express support against this injustice to human rights.

Helen Israel, president of Halifax Women's ORT, said many attending were not aware of the possibility of Jewish women with civil divorces being stranded in their Jewish marriages. "I am shocked by what I heard," she said.

With files from Joel Jacobson in Halifax, Frances Kraft in Toronto, Neil Loomer in Edmonton, Myron Love in Winnipeg, Maurice Lucow in Vancouver, and Miriam Sobel in Ottawa.

Anti-Semitic vandalism reported up

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Reported incidents of anti-Semitic harassment and vandalism in Canada in 1993 increased by 31 per cent over the previous year to a total of 256 cases (105 vandalism; 151 harassment), according to the annual audit of anti-Semitic incidents conducted by B'nai Brith Canada's (BBC's) League for Human Rights.

In 12 years of documenting such reports, the League has never recorded such a high number, it was announced at a press conference held last week.

Anti-Semitic acts of vandalism increased by 128 per cent over 1992, while incidents of harassment remained stable. Over 60 per cent of all reported incidents occurred in Toronto and Montreal, home to Canada's two largest Jewish communities.

Ottawa, with Canada's fifth largest Jewish community, saw a 72 per cent increase in reported incidents, from 25 in 1992 to 43 in 1993. The Heritage Front, Canada's most active right-wing extremist group, actively recruited students at Ottawa area high schools, established a local telephone hotline and placed posters on downtown utility poles, it was noted in the audit.

In May, the Heritage Front and the Church of the Creator, a like-minded group, organized a "Rock for Racialism" concert, which led to street battles in the area around Parliament Hill.

Toronto was the scene of organized hate activity as well as a number of isolated incidents. Holocaust denier Ernst Zundel continued anti-Semitic activities through satellite television and radio broadcasts, the audit noted.

Thornhill high school student Andrea Prasow, a member of B'nai Brith's Human Rights Youth League, noted that teenagers are especially vulnerable to racism. "If people are taught that there are options, they will have the freedom to make informed choices," she noted.

Rochelle Wilner, Ontario regional chair of the League for Human Rights who presented the audit summary, noted that hate group recruitment at the school level is "subtle, sophisticated and directly targeted at individual students who look as if they might be receptive."

Joshua Meles, chair of the Network Canada (the Canadian arm of World Union of Jewish Students) anti-Semitism task force and a member of the Youth League, commended the League for Human Rights' handbook, Anti-Semitism on Campus, as a guide for fighting bigotry. "Inter-cultural dialogue and education cannot be understressed," he said.

The audit cited anti-Semitic acts across the country including harassment of a Jewish artist in Sackville, New Brunswick, by young people giving the Nazi salute; the fire-bombing — accompanied by swastikas — of a Winnipeg business; desecration of Victoria's Congregation Emmanuel; and a bomb threat directed at Vancouver's Jewish Community Centre. Calgary's House of Jacob Synagogue was the target of arsonists in September.

Karen Mock, national director of the League, explained that great pains are taken to ensure accurate recording. "Harassment of a Jewish person in the workplace may be real, but may not be anti-Semitic," she noted, adding that such an incident would not be included.

An anti-Semitic mail campaign in a defined area over a defined period of time would be recorded as only one incident, she said, noting that care is taken to avoid double-counting of incidents.

The League "enjoys the co-operation of many of the politicians and [of] police services right across the country," said Mock. Police hate crime units have been established in Ottawa, Toronto, Montreal and Winnipeg. Three police representatives attended the press conference to show their support for the work of the League.

"We have repeatedly called for the creation of a joint forces operation that will encompass metropolitan police forces, provincial police forces, RCMP, Customs, Immigration, Canada Post, Revenue Canada and Canadian Security Intelligence Service to co-operate effectively in halting the spread of hatred in this country," said Frank Dimant, BBC executive vice-president.

"There must be shared intelligence and data. There must be co-operation between the bureaus. But most important, there must be political will to stop hatred," he continued. "While the people in the field are responsive, political leadership is sadly trailing behind."

The League has been fighting anti-Semitism in Canada for almost 30 years, said BBC president Gabriel Nachman. Among its pro-active initiatives are Black-Jewish dialogues and Muslim-Jewish dialogues. The Human Rights Youth League was established in 1993 to give young people the skills to take a stand against racism.

Incidents increase in Quebec

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Action Democratique leader Jean Allaire was rebuked by Stephen Scheinberg, national chair of the B'nai Brith (BB) League for Human Rights, for fostering anti-immigrant feeling by proposing that newcomers be required to sign a "social contract" committing them to integrating into the francophone majority.

Such ideas encourage the seeking out of scapegoats, which certain people tend to do in tough economic times, said Scheinberg, on the occasion of the release of the League's 1993 audit of anti-Semitic incidents in Canada.

"In a climate of economic uncertainty and political fatigue, we have witnessed an erosion of traditional taboos against expressing hatred, and an explosion of hate crimes directed against the Jewish community and its institutions," Scheinberg said of the dramatic increase in incidents nationally.

He characterized the situation in Canada as part of a global trend toward right-wing extremism as a solution to economic and political problems.

The number of incidents reported to BB of anti-Semitic vandalism and harassment incidents more than doubled in Quebec from 25 in 1992 to 54 last year.

These consisted of 33 acts of vandalism, 17 instances of verbal or physical harassment and four threats, including death threats. The vast majority occurred in the Montreal area.

The vandalism statistics were inflated by a series of daubings of synagogues, a Jewish community centre and homes in Laval, in January and February. The night of Jan. 1-2, 1993 saw the spray-painting of seven synagogues, which was followed by other apparently "copycat" activities.

The perpetrators were never found, but Paul Dufort, assistant director of the Montreal Urban Community (MUC) Police intelligence section, believes they are the work of racist groups and not "lone wolves."

However, the rest of the year saw no similar level of activity. In July, 18 stones in a Jewish cemetery were found overturned, but Scheinberg said an anti-Semitic motive is not certain.

What does disturb the League more than any isolated incidents is the movement into Quebec of the neo-Nazi Heritage Front, which held a gathering in Vaudreuil for young people last spring, and has set up a "hotline," and the appearance at Concordia University last May of Khalid Abdul Mohammed, assistant to American Nation of Islam leader Louis Farrakhan.

Scheinberg, who is a Concordia professor, said Mohammed's appearance shocked him, because his "anti-Semitic and homophobic diatribe" received an enthusiastic reception from the audience of 400, mainly black persons.

"The good side," according to Scheinberg, "was that some of the leaders of the black community, such as Dan Philip [of the Black Coalition of Quebec] and Noel Alexander [Jamaican Association of Montreal] spoke out against him [Mohammed]. Hopefully, he represents only a small group in the black community."

The League emphasized the co-operation that exists between it and the MUC police in combatting crimes motivated by anti-Semitism.

Dufort has for several years been a member of the Jewish community's "security co-ordinating" committee.

On Jan. 1, the MUC police instituted a policy that, if hate is the motivation, a crime should be viewed more seriously than it might otherwise be, he said.

Graffiti-writing, for example, is in itself seen as a minor crime, but if it is motivated by hatred against any racial, ethnic or national group, police officers have been instructed to "treat it as a priority."

"If a synagogue has a swastika painted on it, we understand that it is an act with serious consequences [to the community]," Dufort said.

He is convinced that members of groups like Heritage Front, the Ku Klux Klan and some skinheads are painting graffiti, but it is difficult to arrest anyone. "Crimes against property are the hardest to solve. There are no witnesses, especially when it's done in the middle of the night."

Dufort thinks the explanation is greater awareness among police officers of hate as a component of criminal activity.

Jews of Sarajevo riding out siege

Subsisting on humanitarian aid

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

SARAJEVO — The Jews remaining in Sarajevo spend endless days in the Jewish community center, waiting for something to change.

The community centre, adjacent to the old Ashkenazi synagogue of Sarajevo, has served as a home and shelter for Jews and non-Jews alike.

They receive warm meals there, the result of donations from the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee and the Jewish La Benevolencija organization.

Despite the 20-month-long siege of Sarajevo, the 500 Jews who still live there suffer no hunger. They live on donated food.

The United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees also provides food, but the quantities are negligible. The ration comes to a litre of oil, a package of sugar and three pounds of flour per person every three weeks. And every person is entitled to receive a third of a loaf of bread each day.

The donations given to the Jewish community center supplement the food rations of the UNHCR. Each recipient obtains an additional 26 pounds of food each month, and a warm meal every day.

Fruit, meat and vegetables are rare, available on the local black market for exorbitant prices. Two pounds of potatoes cost $50; similar amounts of sugar and meat cost $23 and $40 respectively.

Where do these black-market products come from? From neighboring Serb villages, smuggled at great risk. Some say they come from UN soldiers, who make a quick profit on the side.

"But you don't need money around here," said Slobodan Kosonovic, 48, a computer expert who is now out of work. "You can simply live on humanitarian aid."

On one of the few remaining walls in the once-magnificent Old Town Hall there is a one-word declaration of nostalgia: "TITO." Whoever wrote it apparently longed for the days of the authoritarian marshal who would not let the people of Yugoslavia destroy themselves.

But Iosip Tito is long gone, and the people of Yugoslavia are doing an excellent job of destroying themselves and their country.

Despite the quiet brought by the NATO ultimatum late last month, Sarajevo is still one of the saddest places in the world. It is a huge prison where people are quietly walking the streets, barely saying a word, absorbed in their thoughts about their ever-growing share of agony.

Among the city's unhappy citizens is Alex Bojanic, a professor at the Sarajevo Academy of Sciences and Arts. He works in their publishing department. But there is no publishing, because there is hardly any paper.

Nonetheless, he is planning to publish 20 books — after the war.

Bojanic and his wife, Nenad, have shoved old shoes into the kitchen oven in an attempt to create some heat.

"These are the shoes of the children. The children are safe in Croatia and Holland, so we no longer need the shoes," they said.

At times they burn books to heat their home.

"Last night Ben-Gurion went up in flames," said Alex Bojanic, his eyes glowing with dark humor.

In better times, the Bojanices spent their summers on the beaches of Makarska, which is now in Croatian hands, or even on the French Riviera. In the old days they made full use of the good life Sarajevo had provided as the center of culture, business and arts of Bosnia-Herzegovina.

Although those days are long gone, the Bojanices do not want to leave.

They hope for the good days to return. The shelling and shooting is over, but the siege goes on. And the people of Sarajevo are prisoners in their own city.

Among the prisoners is Igor, a tall, 20-year-old blond Serb. He is one of 5,000 Serbs still living in Sarajevo.

Even when they are not part of the fighting, the Serbs are at times regarded as the enemy because they are hardly enthusiastic partners to the Muslim war effort.

For months, Igor has lived in a hideout, sleeping in a cold office building with no light or heat, living on food that his mother brings him daily.

Even if there is peace for Sarajevo, Igor will not have peace and quiet. He will be a prisoner in his own city. At best he may flee — and become a refugee elsewhere.

Rabbi Krentzman sentenced to five years

Two of the fraud convictions concern a cheque for over $88,400 which Rabbi Krentzman forged and deposited at a Royal Bank of Canada branch Jan. 13, 1993. He withdrew the money five days later.

Rabbi Krentzman received six months on these two counts. In addition, the $6,671 found on his person at the time of his arrest on these charges in January 1993, plus the $5,000 bail he later posted on the fraud charges, are to be remitted to the defrauded bank.

Rabbi Krentzman and another person were also charged with break-and-enter with theft at a home at 1762 Couvrette St., St. Laurent, Dec. 7. That was changed to conspiracy with the property owner to defraud an insurance company.

Dufresne said Krentzman and the other person charged in connection with the case arranged with the owner to simulate a break-in and steal and destroy property, but the scheme went awry when the owner's brother called the police after hearing noise. The two were arrested on the premises.

Krentzman's sentence on this count is three months.

In the two false-declaration convictions, Rabbi Krentzman pleaded guilty to giving false information in March 1993 that enabled Larry Aguebor and Rose Mary Aguebor to get Canadian passports. The Aguebors, later arrested, said they paid Galandauer to get the passports; Rabbi Krentzman swore he had known them for two years, when in fact he had not, Dufresne said.

The sentence on these two counts is three months.

Thamotharampillai received a 33-month sentence after pleading guilty Feb. 21 to three drug charges involving a total of three grams.

Dufresne told the court Rabbi Krentzman deserved five years because heroin in particular, turns its addicts into "walking corpses" with little chance of recovery.

Moreover, as a rabbi, he had broken the confidence and credibility his community had placed in him.

Defence lawyer Raphael Schachter portrayed Rabbi Krentzman as a tragic figure who "for an isolated period of his life appears to have lost his way." He called his crimes an "aberration," noting that he had no previous conviction and had led an "exemplary life."

Quoting poet Robert Frost and Matthew's Gospel, Schachter declared that "there but for the grace of God go anybody," given the circumstances.

"Half of the (Jewish) community has told me he deserves no mercy because he held the position of rabbi. The other half feels pity, horror at this human tragedy that affects him and his wife and five children, the youngest only three years old."

"One never knows when fate will place us in a position that we commit some act that under ordinary circumstances we could not conceivably perform," Schachter said.

Appearing unswayed, Judge Lagace said that he could not understand how fathers like Rabbi Krentzman could deal in drugs, knowing the devastating effect they have on young people, especially so with heroin.

"We see it every day. [Family men] like you [trafficking drugs because they think the police will not suspect them]. The users are called bums, while you're supposed to be a respected person."

However, Lagace said he accepted the five years' recommended by the Crown because Rabbi Krentzman has no previous conviction and has "more or less, lost everything.

"You have lost the respect of your community, and financially this is very costly."

Schachter later said Rabbi Krentzman will be eligible for parole after serving one-third of the five years. He was held in detention for over one month.

Canadian Jewish leaders condemn Hebron murders

Jewish Telegraphic Agency and CJN Staff

While unilaterally condemning last Friday's killing of 39 Muslims as the act of a lone madman, some North American Jewish leaders were divided over the political context of the killings and how the incident would and should affect the peace process.

Many Jewish leaders rushed to insist that the massacre was an aberration that does not represent the sentiment of most Jews or the tone of Israeli-Palestinian relations.

"Just as we dare not blame all of the Palestinians for acts of terrorism committed against Israelis," cautioned Frank Dimant, executive vice president of B'nai Brith Canada, "we should not seek now to blame all Israeli residents in the West Bank for the act of what was obviously one deranged individual.

"Massacres of Jews in Hebron in the 1920s and 1930s and events such as the one [last Friday] demonstrate in graphic form how crucial the success of the current peace process is," Dimant added.

In other Jewish community reaction:

• Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) issued a statement expressing "profound regret and horror" at the shooting spree.

"We condemn this action in the strongest possible terms and express condolences to the families of the innocent victims," CJC president Irving Abella said.

Irving Abella

Abella said he extended the Canadian Jewish community's "sincere sympathy" to the presidents of the Canadian Arab Federation and Palestine House.

• The Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) expressed its "deep sadness" at the incident, "which must be seen as part of the ongoing cycle of violence in the West Bank and Gaza Strip." CIC national chair Daniel Pekarsky called on all all parties "to remain focused on the broader issue."

• The Toronto Board of Rabbis, under the signature of president Rabbi Dow Marmur, expressed its "shock and pain" at the event" and extended symapthies to the victims' families "and to all Palestinians who grieve the death of the victims."

Rabbi Marmur also wrote a letter of condolence to Rashad Saleh of Palestine House.

Canadian Arab Federation president Fayid Arad called on Canada to work through the United Nations "for the immediate disarming of all Israeli settlers in the Occupied Palestinian territories" and for Ottawa to facilitate "the creation of a UN force for the security needs of the Palestinians living under Israeli occupation," — echoing earlier demands issued by the PLO.

The federation sent a letter to CJC, asking its support for those two demands.

To show their outrage, members of the Palestinian and Arab communities in Toronto demonstrated outside Israel's consulate last Saturday.

Daniel Pekarsky

Many North American Jewish leaders also insisted that the actions of Israeli and Palestinian extremists not be allowed to affect the course of the peace accords now being negotiated, stressing that both parties have suffered from ongoing violence and both will benefit from a peaceful resolution of the situation.

"We must not allow this or other acts of violence to undermine the peace negotiations, incite tensions in the area or provoke further bloodshed," said Lester Pollack, chair of the powerful Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations.

Pollack said his organization was "stunned" by the killings.

The chair of the National Jewish Community Relations Council, Lynn Lyss, said the incident highlights the need for speedy implementation of the declaration of principles signed in September.

Violation of Jewish law

"We hope that today's tragedy will spur a renewal of efforts to bring peace and reconciliation between Israel and the Palestinians," Lyss said in a statement.

Lyss and others applauded U.S. President Bill Clinton's call for the peace negotiations to be resumed "in continuous session" in Washington.

Religious and communal leaders also stressed that the killings are a violation of Jewish law.

Rabbi Marvin Hier, dean of the Simon Wiesenthal Center, condemned the killings as "a senseless, wanton murder that dishonors the principles of Judaism."

But others insisted that the incident be seen as part of a larger sense of frustration and uncertainty among settlers living in the territories.

While condemning the killing, Rabbi Shlomo Riskin, founder of New York's Lincoln Square Synagogue and Chief Rabbi of the West Bank settlement of Efrat, called gunman Baruch Goldstein, an American-born Israeli, "a very compassionate doctor who just went insane."

Rabbi Riskin, who said Goldstein was known as the "tzaddik (righteous man) of Kiryat Arba," said Goldstein had been extremely frustrated by ongoing attacks against Israeli settlers and by anti-Jewish sentiment voiced by some West Bank Arabs.

Rabbi Riskin, who was visiting New York last week, said that further acts of violence against West Bank Palestinians could not be prevented unless the Israeli government takes the settlements "out of the position of uncertainty."

Americans for a Safe Israel, a group aligned with right-wing elements in Israel, said a poll of their constituents revealed that most blame the Israeli government for the attack, faulting it for creating "enormous frustration" among Jewish settlers.

The organization attacked Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and Foreign Minister Shimon Peres for allowing the PLO to "get away with murder in recent months."

"It is no wonder this kind of tragedy should occur," the organization said in a statement.

Others saw the incident as proof that it is time for the Hebron settlers to move out.

Rabbi Dow Marmur

The left-leaning Americans for Peace Now said in a statement that to ensure the peace process proceeds unimpeded, the Israeli government should "remove Jewish settlers from the heart of Hebron where their presence inflames relations and poses a danger to all residents of the area."

Henry Siegman, executive director of the American Jewish Congress, faulted the Israeli government for allowing Goldstein and other members of Kahane Chai to live so close to an Arab city. "To allow fevered right-wing Jewish radicals to settle in the midst of heavily populated Palestinian urban areas like the city of Hebron is to invite this kind of tragedy," he said.

Describing their presence as a "prescription for undoing the peace process," Siegman called on the government to remove all settlers from urban areas.

But Judy Balint, a spokeswoman for the Coalition for Jewish concerns-AMCHA, said the incident does not alter the right of Jews to live wherever they have legally taken up residence. She described calls by some Palestinians to disarm Jewish settlers as "outrageous."

"It's obvious that Jews will be subject to revenge attacks and they must be able to defend themselves," Balint said.

Balint also tried to put the attack in the context of anti-Jewish sentiment in the area.

"One must understand that Hebron is crackling with anti-Jewish hatred by local Arabs," she said. "Just this past Saturday a mob of local Arabs entered the same Tomb of the Patriarchs screaming 'Death to the Jews' at a group of American Jews on a fact-finding and solidarity mission in Israel."

At a Los Angeles news conference last Friday, leaders of Jewish and Arab organizations pledged to continue working together on local issues and for peace in the Middle East.

Palestinians may pull out of peace talks, Husseini warns

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

JERUSALEM — Palestinians will not agree to return to the peace talks unless the issue of the Jewish settlements is at the top of the agenda, Palestinian delegation head Faisal Husseini said Monday. The East Jerusalem leader also warned that unless all Jewish settlers are disarmed, Palestinians will be forced to arm themselves.

Speaking three days after the Hebron massacre, Husseini said that "what happened on Friday was not a complete surprise to us. It was the realization of our worse nightmare." He blamed the attack on the "soft line" taken by Israeli authorities in dealing with extremist settlers.

He maintained that several months ago, the Moslem Religious Authority in Hebron had warned Israeli military authorities of the danger posed by a number of individuals, including Baruch Goldstein, the perpetrator of Friday's massacre. However, their warnings had been ignored, he said.

"If the Israeli government continues to give a free hand to the settlers then no one will have learned anything from this."

He dismissed as "insufficient" the measures taken by the Israeli cabinet in response to the killing. "Perhaps five or 10 Kach activists will be arrested. But there are hundreds of people who shouldn't be allowed to carry weapons."

He argued that the army should be the only body entitled to carry weapons in the territories. "If the government refuses to disarm settlers then it means that the army is not in a position to protect civilians — or that the settlers do not trust the army.

"Either way, it means that we must also acquire weapons to protect ourselves. But I would prefer to disarm the settlers than ask Palestinians to arm themselves."

When asked what he proposed to do about Hamas terrorist attacks against settlers, Husseini said when the PLO assumes full authority the terrorists would be disarmed. He acknowledged that at present "Hamas people are not completely under our control," but said "when Palestinians begin to see the implementation of the agreement, the community will take steps to reduce these terrorist acts to a minimum."

Husseini said Palestinians had always been uncomfortable with deferring discussion of the Jewish settlements to the final stage of negotiations, as agreed upon in the Declaration of Principles.

"We are not trying to destroy the Oslo agreement. But this event [the Hebron massacre] has proven that this one point in the agreement is not acceptable or practical. We are not demanding that a solution to the settlements be implemented now. But we are asking that it be discussed now — if we are to resume negotiations."

But Husseini is already demanding that no Jewish settlement be included in the areas slated to be under Palestinian rule during the first phase of the accord, the Gaza-Jericho withdrawal of the Israeli army — a demand which contravenes the agreements worked out in Cairo.

"Having Jewish settlements in the Gaza Strip — after the withdrawl of the Israeli army — is a time bomb," he asserted.

"Imagine what would happen if an incident like Friday's massacre happened in Gaza after the Israeli army had withdrawn. Who would control the Palestinian reaction? The Israeli army would re-occupy the area, claiming that we failed to control our people. We cannot provide full control unless we have full authority."

Husseini added that as long as there are Jewish settlements in the Gaza Strip, Israel will insist on an army presence around the settlements and on all access roads leading to them. "The Palestinians will not feel any change under self-rule. The continued presence of the military and of armed settlers will be like a continuation of the occupation," he said.

Israel to establish commission to investigate Hebron killings

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Amid sharp differences of opinion, the Israeli cabinet has agreed to launch an investigation into the circumstances surrounding the Hebron massacre, and to attempt to limit the activities of Jewish extremists in the territories.

On Sunday, the cabinet agreed to establish an official commission of inquiry into the killings. The commission, which will be headed by a Supreme Court judge, was criticized by Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin as "a big mistake."

The cabinet also ordered a series of legal and administrative measures aimed at extremists among West Bank settlers.

The new measures include the imposition of administrative detention, effectively enabling security forces to circumvent the judicial system and detain Israelis; the enactment of orders barring the entry of certain, unspecified people into the West Bank, particularly Hebron; and the disarmament of specific individuals and the confiscation of their weapons permits.

The cabinet also gave Attorney General Michael Ben-Yair the task of exploring options for outlawing the Kach and Kahane Chai organizations, founded by slain Jewish Defence League leader Meir Kahane and which militantly oppose the government's peace initiatives.

The officer in charge of the Central Command, Gen. Danny Yatom, told reporters on Sunday that administrative detention orders had already been issued against five prominent Kach activists with "a record of violent and lawless behavior," but only one had been served thus far.

According to media reports here, other Kach activists have gone into hiding.

Neither Rabin nor Yatom was prepared to say how many people would be affected by the various orders that were yet to be issued.

During its meeting Sunday, the cabinet also agreed that some 800 to 1,000 Palestinian prisoners and detainees would be released during the coming week.

The release of prisoners and detainees in large numbers has long been a key demand raised by the PLO during the negotiations for establishing self-rule in the Gaza Strip and Jericho.

Israel had previously planned a prisoner release to coincide with the end of the Muslim holy month of Ramadan, but the releases will be moved forward, and increased in scope, as a goodwill gesture to the PLO.

Israeli sources said the released Palestinians would not include any people imprisoned for direct involvement in terrorism.

Israeli policy-makers hope the cabinet's decisions, which are intended to demonstrate new resolve to stamp out Jewish extremism, will facilitate the quick resumption of the peace talks.

Some cabinet ministers said over the weekend that what is needed now is to speed up the talks and reach an agreement on Palestinian self-rule soon as possible.

In Tunis, however, initial reaction from PLO headquarters to the Israeli government's decisions was distinctly tepid.

Following Friday's killings by Baruch Goldstein of the West Bank settlement of Kiryat Arba, the PLO demanded an international presence in the territories to protect the Palestinians. It has also called for the dismantling of all Israeli settlements.

On Sunday night, Yatom categorically denied that anyone but Goldstein had fired at the worshipers in the mosque. He rejected victims' accounts that soldiers arriving at the scene had fired into the crowd.

But Yatom conceded that some soldiers who should have been on duty at the mosque were apparently not there.

This was a reference to several border policemen who should have taken up positions at the entrances to the mosque at 5 a.m. Friday. Border policemen arrived later — by which time the attack was over.

Rabin said the IDF and the defense establishment had "nothing to fear" from a commission of inquiry.

He had opposed the idea, he said, because it would entail a massive expenditure of energy by a large number of officeholders.

Under the Commission of Inquiry Law of 1968, the president of the Supreme Court appoints commissions, selecting its chairman from among the list of serving or retired Supreme Court justices. Like a court of law, a commission hears evidence given under oath and has the power to subpoena witnesses.

Justice Minister David Libai, who proposed the establishment of a formal commission, said it was important for Israel, the Palestinians and the entire world to have full confidence in the factual findings of an official board of inquiry.

The gunslinger vs. the mediator: a tale of two lawyers

Lately I've been hearing that when shopping for a divorce lawyer, the customer must choose between a "gunslinger" or a mediator, depending on the desired approach. Presumably, the gunslinger aggressively pushes for what one wants, while a mediator seeks to "resolve" contentious issues in a quiet way, through "four-way" meetings, mediation, or earnest telephone dialogue.

This popular misconception must be put to rest. The spouse who finds himself or herself going through the horrible agony of separation should forget stereotypes. Often the same lawyer who takes an aggressive position in one case is surprisingly moderate in the next. I have had some clients who pay me to take the most aggressive positions imaginable in the hope that they will inevitably strike the "best deal"; I have had to restrain such people from spending money on useless tactics that may alienate the Court and detour them from more productive paths, including "hard nosed" settlement proposals and meetings. Often the people who want a "gunslinger" at the outset become surprisingly "gunshy" after the bill of account that follows the first "shootout", even though they were amply warned beforehand.

On more than a few occasions, family law lawyers have become easy targets in the media for "overspending" the time and personnel on a certain file, particularly when the court reassesses the fees that have been paid or are being requested. In at least some of these cases, the time docketed was not exaggerated or unnecessary, but the direct result of a small minority of clients who do not know when to stop calling their lawyers over every dispute that arises. This is particularly true in Kramer vs. Kramer-type custody wars. The Court often feels that it is the lawyers who are to blame in such cases, since they are expected to "control" this type of client behaviour.

Exactly who controls whom? In my next column I'll examine this point further and explain why the best choice between a gunslinger and a mediator may be neither.

UN considering resolution to respond to Hebron attack

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

UNITED NATIONS — The United Nations struggled over the weekend to reach an agreement on a response to the Hebron massacre.

Gad Ya'acobi, Israel's Ambassador to the United Nations, expressed regret for "the tragic, criminal murders in Hebron" and said "the only sincere solution to the conflict between Israelis and Palestinians is to enhance the implementation of the agreement between Israel and the PLO."

"We will not allow militant fanatics from either side to undermine the peace," he said. "This was our reaction to killings by militants in the past, and this has to be our position now."

UN Secretary-General Boutros Boutros-Ghali spoke of his "revulsion and outrage" over the killings and also voiced apprehension over the subsequent violence that erupted in the territories, in which more Palestinians were killed in confrontations with Israeli soldiers.

Boutros-Ghali called for calm so that the talks between Israel and the PLO could continue.

The UN Security Council held a meeting last Saturday night to draft a resolution on the murders, but was unable to reach agreement on the resolution's language.

Nasser Al-Kidwa, the PLO's UN observer, intimated that any delay in passing a resolution could also delay the resumption of the Israeli-PLO talks.

One Israeli official said Sunday that informal consultations among members of the Security Council "are going on all the time, including by phone."

The official told JTA: "We don't think the UN should have any role other than to make some sort of a declaration, because we have negotiations going on between us and the Palestinians, and this is where things should be resolved.

"It's fine if the UN wants to make a statement condemning the actual massacre in Hebron," the official said. "Whatever they want to say, that would be an expression of the international community.

"But we don't think the UN should have an active role in the negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians. It should be left to the two parties to work it out."

The official, who requested anonymity, explained that the delegates to the Security Council meeting had failed to agree on two out of four main points under discussion.

The official said the United States was in agreement with Israel on those two points.

"The intention of the United States, mostly, is to have a resolution that will pass by consensus. It will be in agreement with all members of the Security Council, also including Israel and the PLO, which are not members of council," the Israeli said.

The first of the four points was a condemnation of the massacre in Hebron.

"This is an agreement among everybody," the Israeli official said. "We have no problem with that."

The second point was a call for an urgent conclusion of the implementation of the Sept. 13 agreement between Israel and the PLO. "We have no problem with that, either," the source said.

Israel and the United States did not agree to the third point, which was the PLO's desire for "a paragraph of the resolution, talking about the need to guarantee the safety and security of Palestinians in the territories."

"They want to say 'including Jerusalem.' They always try to do this," the official said. "They always try to incorporate Jerusalem in the territories, and our position is that Jerusalem is not part of the territories, and they try to do this now.

"We don't agree to this. And the U.S. doesn't either," the official said.

The fourth point was "a call for an international presence in the territories to provide security for the Palestinians, which we oppose and the Americans opposed and many others opposed."

Ya'acobi told some UN envoys that according to the Sept. 13 agreement between Israel and the PLO, there will be a Palestinian police force in the territories.

"Then we will have the Palestinian police protecting Palestinians and the Israeli army protecting Israelis, working together to provide security to all. And therefore there is no need for any international presence," Ya'acobi said.

"What we need to do is to implement the agreement fast," Ya'acobi said.

The Israeli source said, "At least we know the Americans are supporting this, too, and a few others among the Europeans."

Kach leader won't condemn killings

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Canadian spokesman for the Kach movement has refused to condemn Baruch Goldstein for the Hebron shooting, saying instead that he is working with Kach members in the United States and Israel to set up a trust fund for Goldstein's family.

"We don't condemn [Goldstein]," said Meir Halevi, who also heads the Jewish Defence League (JDL) in Canada. "We understand what drove him to do what he did. If anyone is to be condemned, it's the Israeli government for not providing adequate security for the settlers."

Halevi said he did not know Goldstein personally, although one JDL activist from Canada who visited Israel in the 1980s stayed with him for a short time. But he said "I fully understand why he did it. I'm not saying it's a good thing to do, but I understand what led him to do it."

Meir Halevi

Halevi said that while "the loss of life for anyone is bad. . . there's only so much people can take. It's not a good thing but I have no time to feel any compassion for them. I'm still weeping for the pregnant woman killed in front of her kids." He was referring to Tzippora Sasson, an Israeli settler killed recently by Palestinian terrorists while driving in the territories with her family.

"As long as Arabs kill Jews and the Israeli government doesn't do enough to protect the settlers, someone will snap and take matters into their own hands," he said.

Halevi said in May 1980 a number of yeshiva students in Hebron were killed by terrorists. "There was not one Arab leader who cried out against that," he said.

Halevi said he has begun soliciting contributions in Canada for a trust fund for Goldstein's family.

Goldstein eulogized as a hero by right-wing militants in Israel

Israenet

KIRYAT ARBA — Baruch Goldstein, the doctor who shot 39 Muslim worshippers to death in Hebron last Friday, was buried on Sunday in Kiryat Arba. Several Kach militants wanted by the police attended the funeral.

About 1,000 people stood in pouring rain and lightning at the burial. Goldstein's wife had wanted him to be buried in the Jewish cemetery in Hebron, but the army refused permission.

The funeral procession began in Jerusalem with several right-wing militants eulogizing Goldstein as a hero and a holy martyr. After the eulogies, the body was loaded onto an ambulance. Mourners were not allowed by the police to follow the vehicle on foot but had to go to Kiryat Arba by bus.

KFAR SAVA — Maurice Eisenstadt, 80, died in Meir Hospital last Friday morning after being axed to death outside Kfar Sava's central bus station.

The murder was considered the first terrorist attack against a Jewish civilian in retaliation for the Hebron massacre earlier that morning.

Eisenstadt, who immigrated from the United States 14 years ago, died of head injuries on the operating table. There were no witnesses to the murder, although two people were seen fleeing after the attack. A blood-stained ax was found next to the dying man's body.

Italian Radio Gets Yiddish Program

ROME — State-run Italian radio began broadcasting a daily weekday program on Yiddish culture last week.

The host of the program is Moni Ovadia, a Jewish actor and singer living in Milan who has achieved success with a series of plays and musicals based on Yiddish tales.

According to media announcements about the new program, each broadcast will be dedicated to a separate theme.

Ovadia intends to explore various aspects of each theme by combining song, stories, jokes, memories and other sources.

About 40,000 Jews currently live in Italy. Rome, with 15,000 Jews, has the country's largest Jewish community. The Roman Jewish community dates back 2,000 years.

Arafat alters invite to Mandela

AMSTERDAM — During a recent visit to the Netherlands, Palestine Liberation Organization Chairman Yasser Arafat met with Nelson Mandela and extracted a promise from the leader of the African National Congress not to visit Israel until the Palestinian self-rule accord has been implemented.

Arafat made the request of Mandela, who had previously been issued a formal invitation by the Israeli government to visit the country, in an apparent effort to publicize what he considered deliberate delays on the part of Israel to implement the accord.

The withdrawal of Israeli troops and implementation of Palestinian self-rule was scheduled to begin going into effect on Dec. 13 in the Gaza Strip and West Bank town of Jericho, but negotiations became deadlocked over a host of security issues and are still continuing between Israel and the PLO.

Belgian Jews Oppose Pardons

BRUSSELS — Reacting to the country's current political and moral debate on a sharply divisive issue, Belgium's Jewish community has expressed its opposition to the idea of providing amnesty to the thousands of Belgians who collaborated with the Nazis during World War II.

The Coordinating Committee for Belgian Jewish Organizations said in a statement that it stands in firm opposition to any general form of amnesty.

Providing amnesty to collaborators, the Jewish committee said, would mean that "there had been no offence."

The umbrella group for the Belgian Jewish community further stated that "washing out these bad deeds is a slap for all the victims of Nazism."

The issue of amnesty was raised here recently after King Albert of Belgium, in a New Year's speech, recalled that his deceased brother, King Baudouin, had hinted in a 1990 speech at taking measures "that could contribute to reconciliation between all citizens."

The remark was interpreted by some as a new appeal for clemency for the Belgians who helped the Nazi regime.

Computer Equates Jews With Gas

LONDON — An international company has canceled all further orders of a spellcheck database after renowned photographer Gemma Levine discovered the word "gas" was displayed when she keyed in the word "Jewish."

The Innovations catalogue, distributed in newspapers and by direct mail, advertised the electronic spellchecker, which incorporates 85,000 entries based on "Roget's Thesaurus."

The company's product development manager, Andy White, said the software was brought in from China. Until it is altered, the company will not be buying any more he said. A version of the product, with the same problem, is sold in the United States.

White said the machine did not accept proper nouns such as Jewish, Christian and Christmas and would seek the nearest equivalent. Using the word "garage" as an example, he said a "g" and "j" were phonetically interchangeable.

NJCRAC Supports Peace Process

NEW ORLEANS — Israel's peace policies has received a loud endorsement from a major umbrella organization of American Jewry.

The National Jewish Community Relations Advisory Council voted to "strongly support" the peace process, after an effort to torpedo the resolution received only three votes from the nearly 200 community relations councils and the 12 national agencies that comprise the council.

The final resolution passed unanimously.

The NJCRAC vote was seen as significant by long-time advocates of the dovish policies underlying the current peace process, since the NJCRAC plenum has in recent years hosted the most free-wheeling debate on Israeli policies under a broad American Jewish communal umbrella.

Peru Appoints Jewish Leader as PM

Efrain Goldenberg Schreiber, formerly Peru's foreign minister, became the country's prime minister on Feb. 17, replacing Alfonso Bustamente, who recently resigned from the position.

Goldenberg, who will retain the foreign minister's portfolio, was a businessman with little formal governmental or diplomatic experience before he became foreign minister last September. (Goldenberg, like many Latin Americans, often drops the mother's family name in nonformal usages.)

But even from his youth, Goldenberg has been actively involved in Jewish communal work.

Goldenberg, who speaks Yiddish, was a member of a Zionist youth group and he currently is a member of the Executive of the World Jewish Congress, which is made up of representatives from regional groups of the WJC.

Soldier Gets Secular Burial

TEL AVIV — An Israeli soldier has been given a secular burial in the military section of a cemetery, marking the first time a military burial service has been performed without the presence of a representative of the rabbinate.

After Oded Rabinovitz, 21, died in a traffic accident this month, his parents told military authorities that their son had wanted to be buried in a purely secular fashion.

The chief chaplain for the Israel Defence Force, Maj.-Gen. Gad Navon, said he saw no reason to disregard the request. His ruling was upheld by the adjutant-general at General Headquarters and by the military's legal adviser.

But former Chief Rabbi Shlomo Goren, who was once the chief IDF chaplain, expressed his displeasure with the decision. Rabbi Goren claimed that IDF standing orders call for all military funerals to be performed by a chaplain.

Czechs Pledge Property Return

PRAGUE — The Czech Republic will act soon to return Jewish property confiscated under the country's Nazi and Communist regimes, Prime Minister Vaclav Klaus has promised Jewish leaders here.

Klaus made the pledge during a meeting last week with the Chief Rabbi of Prague, Karol Sidon, and other leaders of the Czech Jewish community.

The meeting took place four days after the Czech Parliament rejected a bill that would have forced the central government, but not local municipal authorities, to return Jewish properties under its control.

Klaus promised that Jewish property expropriated under the Nazis and Communists and held now by the Czech state — including the collections of the Prague Jewish Museum — will be returned to the Jewish community by government order or by some other act of the Czech authorities.

He also promised to join with the leaders of the three parties that form the country's governing coalition and call upon local municipalities to take similar measures to restore Jewish properties.

UN Likes Israeli Field Hospitals

UNITED NATIONS — An Israeli proposal to establish a field hospital as part of a UN peacekeeping force in Africa has been welcomed by Secretary-General Boutros Boutros-Ghali.

Possible locations for the field hospital are Angola, Mozambique and Rwanda, said Boutros-Ghali during a recent meeting with Israeli Deputy Foreign Minister Yossi Beilin and Ambassador Gad Yacobi.

Providing medical services for UN activities, said Beilin, takes advantage of Israel's large number of doctors, a result, in part, of the mass immigration from the former Soviet Union.

Three Days of Purim

JERUSALEM — Purimshpielers in Israel had an extra reason to celebrate this year: For the first time in a decade, Purim in Jerusalem was a three-day affair. Because it fell on Shabbat, rabbis decreed Shushan Purim was to be observed on Sunday.

Our strategy for 1994 is to be at least equal or better priced than any broker or leasing company.
There is a misconception that so-called brokers can purchase or lease cars for less than an authorized dealer. Nothing can be further from the truth. And, there is far less hassle involved in establishing warranty registration, service, dependability, etc.
Buying or leasing the Parkwood Price is always the Right Price.

The decision is personal. . .

Synagogue affiliation, plot registration and cemetery management in no way limit the freedom to call any particular funeral home, despite reports of misinformation to the contrary. As everyone should know, the decision regarding burial arrangements belongs exclusively and appropriately to the bereaved family, and to no one outside it.

The choice is obvious.

Within the narrow choice there's a clear and indisputable difference. Every senior director at Benjamin's has a wide advantage in years of experience and training. The ability to explain Jewish laws and traditions in depth, the network of professional relationships to count on in unexpected or personal situations and the supervision over sensitive details continuously justify the high regard for Benjamin's as an institution in this community.

By taking their own decisions in hand, and calling upon Benjamin's, families are indicating an uncompromising degree of quality-consciousness for themselves and the memory of a loved one.

BENJAMIN'S

Toronto's Jewish Funeral Director

By RABBI GAVRIEL NEWMAN

Many readers are probably familiar with the sweet story of the Chelmite who was hired by his city to sit atop a tower and watch for the Messiah, lest Chelm not notice when the redeemer arrives.

"What sort of job is this?" asked a critic. "You sit up there, cold and alone — they don't even pay you well. Why do you do it?" "At least I know," answered the Chelmite, "I have a steady job."

Rav Avraham Yitzchak Hacohen Kook (of blessed memory) would probably comment that this is the problem with Jewry today; too many are watching for the Messiah instead of acting to hasten his arrival. In each city, we have shomrim (watchmen) to predict, observe, and announce the Messiah's appearance; yet we do little to alter our patterns appreciably, to remove from before him the behavioral boulders that obstruct his path.

Within this framework we might consider the recent fuss over the latest buzz-word in Jewish organizational work: continuity. Most of our conventions, published papers, subcommittee luncheon meetings and parlor discussions seem to centre on this topic. Many fine speeches are made, excellent insights are offered, brilliant questions thrusted and parried.

Yet the staggering statistics remain, and the threat looms as before. Were there no solutions at hand whatsoever, our conventions and committee meetings would be the logical — perhaps only — course of action.

But solutions do exist; they hover in spirit over us, anxiously awaiting the commitment of our bodies, that they might come to life in our action. The Council of Jewish Federations study of 1991 convincingly established that two major forces impacted upon continuity: traditional observance in the home and Jewish education, which lessen the likelihood of intermarriage and assimilation. Not that our Talmudic Rabbis needed empirical proofs of the truths they espoused through the millenia — but none the less, the verification certainly helps.

The more a home observes of Jewish custom and tradition, and the greater the number of hours spent in Jewish education systems, the less likely are the children to opt out of the Jewish people. One cannot help but wonder, then, why our meetings and conventions do not demonstrate real commitment to continuity by encouraging more observance of Kashrut requirements, Shabbat customs, Shacharit-Mincha-Ma'ariv times and sessions in Talmud Torah (study of Torah). Why, in fact, many a "discussion about continuity" will run through a crucial prayer-service hour, precluding participation by the discussants in prayer.

There most certainly is great value in the new interest and attention given to the subject, and in the fact that we are confronting these threats directly. But the value is lost if the discussions do not lead to practical change, commitments and undertakings. "Keep your tongue from vain discussions," warns the Talmud Yerushalmi, "so that your throat should not experience great thirst" (Shekalim, 77). Discussion that does not lead to action produces only thirst — physical and mental thirst for solutions. Tosefta Yevamot put it thus: "Beautiful are words when they come from the mouths of those who fulfill them" (Yevamot, 8).

We are in danger of creating another dichotomy within our nation, that of observant versus observing Jews. The first group is growing in adherence to tradition, raising children under maximal education and observance levels. The other group is observing, discussing, analyzing statistics, holding meetings and conferences. But they remain "observing" Jews. Like fiddlers on the roof — not Tevye's delightful little fiddler — but rather a fiddler of Rome who carried the name Nero.

Hopefully, with enough dedication we can put all the "Messiah Watchmen" of Chelm and other cities out of work, and usher in a redemptive era.

Chief rabbis challenge legal ruling

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — For the second time in the past three weeks, Israel's chief rabbis have challenged a ruling by the Supreme Court they believe represents an attack on Halachah.

Chief Rabbis Yisrael Lau and Eliyahu Bakshi-Doron issued a resolution last week declaring that non-Orthodox Jews should not serve on the country's municipal religious councils.

The declaration flies in the face of a recent ruling by Israel's Supreme Court that Reform and Conservative candidates for the councils may not be rejected because of their religious orientations.

The Reform movement termed it a "hysterical reaction" by the Orthodox rabbinical establishment and a step toward the delegitimization of the Orthodox.

The declaration follows an announcement by the chief rabbis that they would not comply with another Supreme Court ruling calling for the rabbinical courts to apply civil law, rather than Halachah, to property settlements in divorce cases [CJN, Feb. 24].

Civil law applies the principle of common property and equally divides marital assets upon divorce, while Jewish law generally awards property to the title holder, who is often the husband.

The chief rabbis said the rabbinical courts would not recognize this decision because Halachah has supremacy and could not be violated.

Scholars say the court's ruling on the divorce issue was an unprecedented challenge to rabbinical authority in Israel.

Last week's resolution by the chief rabbis on religious councils was issued following a special meeting with dozens of Orthodox rabbis, rabbinical court judges and heads of religious councils.

The rabbis declared that the services rendered by religious councils must be administered by those who "believe in Halachah, live according to it and accept the authority of the Chief Rabbinate."

The religious councils are funded by the country's Ministry of Religious Affairs and are the only providers of basic religious services to Jewish citizens, including burial and marriage.

The rabbis also called on the Knesset to pass legislation that would prevent the representation of non-Orthodox members on the councils.

Rabbi David Hartman called it "a mistake for the rabbinical establishment to set up a confrontational ethos with the Supreme Court."

Rabbi Hartman, who teaches Jewish philosophy at Hebrew University, said the rabbis were "taking their monopoly and putting a loincloth of Halachah around it.

"The issue is not whether Halachah is more supreme than secular law" and the authority of the state, he said.

Golan Heights withdrawal remains critical for peace

By ALON BEN-MEIR

A strong Israeli public consensus in supporting withdrawal from the Golan Heights is critical to any Israeli-Syrian agreement. That consensus is currently lacking.

Syrian President Hafez al-Assad and Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin must work separately and together to sway Israeli public opinion in that direction. Otherwise, it is unlikely that Israel and Syria will reach an agreement anytime soon.

In Israel, like many other democracies, public opinion plays a very direct and crucial role in the government's decision-making process. Rabin has done poorly in educating the public on the need and rationale for paying a "painful price" for peace. Instead he has left the field wide open to continued onslaughts by right-wing opposition groups, led by the Likud, against the government's "misguided" policy.

Likud has been successful in galvanizing public opinion against extensive withdrawal, effectively tying Rabin's hands at the negotiating table. Moreover, Rabin's inability to implement the first phase of the Israel-PLO agreement has left many Israelis unsure of their government's direction, further deepening their cynicism and distrust of the whole process.

Rabin's idea of putting any agreement with Syria on the Golan to a referendum is misleading. Although a referendum could buy Rabin some time, stifle right-wing opposition and put pressure on Assad to be more forthcoming, it still is not a substitute for cultivating an Israeli public consensus and confidence. It is, in fact, an escape. Rabin justifies the referendum by saying the extent of the projected withdrawal will exceed what the Labor party's platform stipulates, hence the need for a public referendum.

Peace with Syria is not a Labor or Likud issue, it is an national issue charged with psychological and security implications for most Israelis. Rabin must tell them that with today's technologies, strategic territory holds a considerably diminished value. Only peace with normal Arab-Israeli relations, plus a credible military deterrence, will provide Israel with long-term security.

Israelis need to know that there are no other viable options and withdrawal from the Golan is the ultimate price for peace. A referendum that will reject such an agreement with Syria is counterproductive and even dangerous, and a referendum that would endorse such an agreement is not necessary.

Syrian officials reject an Israeli referendum on Syrian territory on the grounds that it is against international law and inconsistent with UN resolution 242 and the guidelines that governed the initial Madrid peace conference. The fact that neither the withdrawal from the Sinai nor the Israeli-PLO agreement were submitted to a referendum adds further credence to their argument. But rejecting the referendum does not nullify the critical importance of Israeli public opinion.

Assad continues to ignore the importance of Israeli public opinion. As Israelis search for signs of reconciliation emanating from Damascus, they come across Syrian positions and attitudes that portend only the contrary. Israeli officials cite the Syrian handlers' adamant refusal to allow Israeli journalists to attend the Geneva press conference of U.S. president Bill Clinton and Assad. Assad had a golden opportunity, they argue, to show his willingness to tear down old barriers but chose not to. In an answer to a question during the press conference, Assad refused to elaborate on what he meant by "normal relations," further disappointing many Israelis who wanted to believe that Israeli-Syrian relations had entered the phase of reconciliation.

Assad needs to be more open and forthcoming. Unlike Assad, the late Egyptian President Anwer al-Sadat understood the Israeli psychological disposition and acted on it with astonishing results. When he journeyed to Jerusalem, Sadat tore down the psychological barriers in one stroke. He captured the minds and imaginations of a multitude of Israelis who responded with open hearts.

Assad must go beyond sound bites. Assad's statement that peace with Israel is a "strategic asset" to Syria and his public utterance of "normal relations" with Israel are two most significant developments. Yet, following decades of mutual enmity, fear and distrust there is still a growing number of Israelis who remain deeply skeptical of Syria. They are looking for human manifestations of Assad's "peace of the brave."

The Syrian leader need not go to Jerusalem but he could invite a group of Israeli academics and journalists to Damascus. He could invite or get invited by Rabin to meet without breaking taboos or taking personal risk and without compromising a single inch of territory.

To persuade the Israelis to give up a tangible asset for what many still consider an elusive peace, the Israelis first must go through a process of learning, adjusting and confidence-building.

Rabin must assume the task of educating the Israelis and disabuse the notion that the Golan and national security are synonymous. Assad must join the battle to win over Israeli public opinion by reaching out to the Israelis and allow human relations to take their course.

New Israeli burial society offering alternatives

By CARL ALPERT

During the past year or so, Israel has been struck by several scandals involving burial of the dead. In one case, when it was discovered that the deceased was a non-Jew, the body was exhumed and interred elsewhere. In another instance, protest was voiced when a Jewish soldier was buried in a military cemetery alongside a Bedouin war hero of the Israel Defence Forces. In these and other instances, Orthodox Jews, basing their argument on Jewish law, insisted that the line of distinction be drawn.

The monopoly over burials by the Orthodox chevra kadisha was challenged several years ago, and the Supreme Court ruled that the Ministry of Religious Affairs had no reason to refuse a licence to a burial society, no matter what its religious coloration. Other faiths do have their own burial rites and their own cemeteries, but heretofore Jews, whether religious or not, had no choice but to accept the chevra kadisha rites.

Actually this monolithic rule was not observed in most of the non-religious kibbutzim, which maintain their own cemeteries and conduct their own services.

A new burial society, Menucha Nechona (Society for eternal Rest), which had been a party to the appeal to the courts, has now obtained rights to more than ten acres of land in a new cemetery being built on the outskirts of Haifa, and local citizenry can choose whether they wish the traditional service or the non-Orthodox one now offered. It should be noted that the government pays the cost of the plot and the funeral service. The memorial stone is the obligation of the family.

Among the elements which will distinguish the new burial society will be the possibility of burying husband and wife side by side, even if one was not Jewish. This has not been possible hitherto. Furthermore, plans are being made for use of coffins, instead of the usual method in Israel of depositing bodies in the graves wrapped in shrouds, a procedure which shocks those from the Western world who observe it for the first time. Coffins are used only in military cemeteries. Tombstones, while bearing inscriptions in Hebrew, may also bear the names of the deceased in Latin characters, and the civil dates may be inscribed as well. The Orthodox cemetery in Haifa has always been lenient in this respect, in contrast to Jerusalem, where it took a court order to obtain that privilege.

How popular will the new cemetery be? An opinion poll conducted in Haifa indicated that 44 per cent of those queried would choose the new and presumably more esthetic service, although 70 per cent of Haifa's residents registered approval in principle of the alternative burial.

Queried about the use of music during a funeral, eight per cent went on record as objecting, and only 15 per cent approved of appropriate music.

There appears to have been little demand for cremation, which is taboo under Orthodox law. Public opinion does not seem to be in favor, especially among those whose families had any association with the Holocaust.

Due to the growing lack of burial space in Haifa's crowded cemeteries, an experiment was launched a few years ago with the construction of two-tiered graves, crypts in a stone wall. The appearance is esthetic, but there does not seem to have been much demand for these graves, and only a few are occupied.

No matter how far Israeli Jews strayed from Orthodox observance in other matters, tradition has remained strong when it comes to burial. It now remains to be seen to what extent the kind of graveside services offered by Menucha Nechona, not necessarily according to the Orthodox rites, will indeed be utilized by the public.

Alienated young immigrants pose special challenge

By CYNTHIA MANN

Increasing numbers of teen-age immigrants are "dropping out" of Israeli society, and the authorities are fighting it.

An estimated 5,000 to 7,000 of the teenagers who have immigrated to Israel from the former Soviet Union since 1989 are not in school or in any other social framework, and thousands more are at risk of dropping out of school, experts say.

The problem of alienated young immigrants has recently gripped the attention of the Israeli authorities.

The Education Ministry, which has established a division for alienated youth, last year set aside a special budget for what they described as "youth at risk."

Meanwhile, the Immigration and Absorption Department of the Jewish Agency for Israel has decided to make the absorption of these alienated young immigrants one of its highest priorities.

Both the Education Ministry and the Jewish Agency are involved in programs that try to bring the youths back into the system through alternative education, vocational training, preparation for military service and social and cultural activities.

"There is a tremendous potential in this wave of aliyah, especially among the young," said Daniel Pins, director of the Jerusalem region of the Jewish Agency's Immigration and Absorption Department.

"If we can intervene and help prevent them from dropping out of the system, they (will) make a tremendous contribution."

He observed that overcoming "culture shock and prejudice on both sides" is one of the biggest tasks facing everyone involved.

This year, said Pins, the Jewish Agency's absorption co-ordinators working throughout the country decided to give high priority to the most vulnerable immigrant groups, which include teen-agers.

Chaim Lahav is director of the youth advancement department of the Education Ministry, which runs programs for alienated immigrant teens. He fought for more than a year to get a special budget for the vulnerable immigrant teens, arguing that their problems are unique.

Lahav was careful to note that Israel has expended a great deal of effort on the more than 500,000 olim, or immigrants, who have arrived from the former Soviet Union since 1989, including the 85,000 teen-agers among them.

But, he added, "there are always people on the periphery for whom the (general) answers don't apply."

Many youths who do not find themselves in school or within other existing frameworks end up on the streets or in gangs, which function for them as alternative "societies."

Lahav said the Education Ministry has built a new model for working with alienated immigrants that corrects mistakes made during past immigration waves.

In the old model, Lahav said, "no matter where you came from, the past was not important" and "you had to assimilate, to fit in and be Israeli."

In the new model, said Lahav, there is room for "pluralism... and different cultures."

There are many reasons some teen-age olim do not fit in at Israeli schools, said Lahav. Many come from families that were already transient before they emigrated, and whose education was therefore disrupted before they arrived in Israel.

Others come from subcultures in which education is not as important as family obligations, and as a result students miss school for long stretches of time.

Falling behind because of the language gap is another big problem, said Lahav.

But the biggest problem, he said, is "the combination of the trauma of immigration and adolescence."

At a time when "they need to know where they are and where they're going," he said, immigrant teens have "lost their environment, their culture, their language, their friends."

And, to make matters worse, he said, "their parents cannot be their anchors" because they are going through their own trauma.

The Jewish Agency has 90 absorption coordinators working throughout Israel. Many of them dispense services from within the municipal government structure.

The Jewish Agency also provides seed money to special municipal youth projects funded by the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, the Zionist Forum and other immigrant societies. (JTA)

A terrible day

Shock. Horror. Grief.

In the words of Israeli President Ezer Weizman, last Friday was "a terrible and difficult day for Jew and Arab in this land," and for Jew and Arab, Jew and Muslim everywhere.

The shock of the first news of the massacre in Hebron was succeeded by horror that such a terrible act could be committed, and committed in a place and at a time sacred to both Jew and Muslim. And then came the grief — grief for those who died; grief for those who were injured; and grief for the fouling of the bright dream of peace, however ephemeral it has appeared over the past weeks.

Just as we have condemned the terrorists who took the lives of innocent Jews, including our own Shelley Halpenny, Fern Rykiss, Marnie Kimmelman and Yehoshua Friedberg, so we must condemn the murderer who took the lives of innocent Palestinian Muslims. Despite his religious garb, Baruch Goldstein's acts were the antithesis of Judaism. Lo tirtzach, Thou shalt not murder — and this was murder.

Baruch Goldstein, it must be remembered, was a member of an extremist political party, Kach, which has been ruled racist by the Israeli Supreme Court and banned from participating in elections for the Knesset. The adherents of Kach and its offshoot Kahane Chai, who attempt to clothe Arab-hatred in the garb of legitimate political policy, are a tiny, albeit dangerous, minority among Jews on either side of the Green Line. In no way should Goldstein's actions be considered, by either Jews or Arabs, as flowing from the positions or policies of the Israeli government or any legitimate Israeli political movement.

In fact, Israeli leaders swiftly condemned Goldstein's acts in the harshest terms. The cabinet ordered a series of legal and administrative measures aimed at extremists among the settlers, and has set up an independent commission of inquiry.

The murders in Hebron may yet spawn more deaths — and not only as a result of rage and riots.

At the time this editorial was written, it was not known if Palestinian negotiators would accept U.S. President Bill Clinton's invitation to meet with Israelis this week in Washington. The Israelis have committed to be there, just as they have been there to negotiate even in the aftermath of terrorist murders of Jews.

If the Palestine Liberation Organization and the frontline Arab states abandon the peace talks, Baruch Goldstein will have accomplished exactly what he set out to do — in the words of Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin: "kill the possibility of a solution to the hundred years' conflict" between Palestinians and Israelis. Inevitably, more innocent people, Jews and Arabs, Israelis and Palestinians, will die.

Out of grief must come resolve: that peace itself not become a victim of the Hebron massacre.

The following are excerpts from statements made by the President, Prime Minister and Foreign Minister of the State of Israel on Friday, Feb. 25:

President Ezer Weizman

Today is a terrible and difficult day for Jews and Arabs in this land. There is no understanding, no forgiveness, and no atonement for this horrible act. I extend my condolences to the families, the citizens of the city of Hebron, and the Arab population throughout the world.

This act must not be allowed to hurt the peace process and the chance of building a new reality of co-operation in the region.

At this difficult time, I call upon all the people of this land — leaders, clergy, Jews and Arabs, Christians and Muslims — to grieve together over every needless loss of life, to show restraint, and to prevent further deterioration, either by word or deed.

Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin

A loathsome, criminal act of murder was committed today at a site holy to both Jews and Arabs in Hebron.

[We] condemn in the most severe terms this terrible murder of innocent civilians, which occurred in the midst of Muslim Ramadan prayers.

This is a difficult day for all those — Jew and Arab — who seek peace. However, the crazed actions of disturbed individuals will not prevent the reconciliation between the citizens of the State of Israel and the Palestinian people.

We will do everything necessary to accelerate the peace talks, to prevent misunderstandings, to remove obstacles and to reach, together, the day of peace — the day on which extremists on both sides will lose all hope of damaging the peace process.

Foreign Minister Shimon Peres

The loathsome murder of Arab worshippers in a house of prayer is a horrifying act which stands out in shocking contrast to our basic Jewish values.

This is a frightening expression of cruelty, devoid of human morality.

DIASPORA SHOULD DEBATE

Deputy Foreign Minister Yossi Beilin has kicked up quite a fuss with his comments regarding Diaspora fundraising for Israel. I find it very interesting the way that the establishment, both in Israel and in the Diaspora, was quick to distance themselves from his remarks. Could it be he hit a nerve with his critique; comments they would prefer not to have to face?

For far too long, Jews outside Israel have defined their Jewishness in terms of donations to Israel. This "chequebook Judaism" is relatively painless, and results in accolades from the community. (Is it any wonder that the Jews most prominent in the public eye are those who raise the most money for Israel?) I agree that Israel is central to Judaism; during 2,000 years of exile Jews from around the world raised funds to support Eretz Yisroel.

However, Beilin is right in that the biggest problem facing Jews today is not Israeli prosperity, but continuity. Is Judaism better served by investing funds in Israel, or by spending money to try to increase the local community's knowledge of Jewish precepts? Perhaps more of the funds raised should be channeled to supporting Jewish schools and sending young people on trips to Israel. I don't know the answer, but it is a question worthy of debate. It does the community a disservice to pretend that the issue is not worth addressing.

DISAGREES WITH U.S. RABBIS

I can't for the life of me grasp what some of the American rabbis are trying to do, when they refuse to take part in the annual Bond fundraising (The CJN, Feb. 3). These so-called wise men should be trying to unite our people, but instead they are taking sides and are dividing our people.

Only the people who fight for "the land of Israel," by living there and dying there, sending their men and women into the army, living with terrorism, inflation, and so on, have the right to decide what should, or shouldn't be done in the territories. These rabbis have no right to take it upon themselves, to decide, that we, who live in Canada, or in the United States or anywhere outside of Israel, should openly dissociate ourselves with the legitimate Government of Israel, freely elected by the people, and in turn, start taking sides with the settlers, who feel they, and only they, are going to decide Israel's fate.

Since when, in the past, have we in the Diaspora ever taken the step of denying "our brothers and sisters" in Israel help, in any form, to help to keep them strong and alive. Now, with even greater need, they rely on us to buy Bonds, so the funds that they provide can be put toward all the wonderful and necessary projects that have been undertaken.

Our monies raised in the past have even helped in establishing these settlements, monies from all congregations, Reform, Conservatives, and Orthodox. So now, since when, should we just support the settlers.

I have just had a friend return from visiting Israel, after a 20 year absence, and he mentioned that a great majority of Israelis are willing to give up the Gaza and Jericho, for a chance of real peace.

Even if we do not agree with this choice, we have the obligation to help all the people of Israel, not just a chosen few.

All Jews around the world would not enjoy the freedoms that we have, if we did not have a strong and united people, especially in Israel.

THE CANCER PICTURE

Re: Erica Meyer Rauzin's column in The CJN (Feb. 17). I agree that people should be more involved with their state of health or illness. Going for regular diagnostic screening tests, as the title says, is a big step towards earlier diagnosis and hence simpler and more effective treatments. With breast cancer, this has resulted in up to a 95 per cent cure rate for Stage 1 Disease. I would also suggest that part of the recovery process mentioned, such as diet (smoking was not mentioned), mental attitude and prayer, can and should be done in advance of cancer. As the saying goes, an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure.

Regarding the use of mammography, the most recent medical studies, one being the Canadian National Breast Screening Study, concludes that mammography under the age of 50 is not recommended. Screening mammography has been shown to improve survival due to earlier diagnosis and treatment only in the post-menopausal group. For women under 50 mammography is not the magic answer in breast cancer. Regular breast self-examinations and regular physical examinations by doctors have proven to be just as effective as screening mammography. This should be part of every woman's strategy to wellness and longevity. Let us all examine what we can do to improve our health without depending so much on technology.

THE HONEY BUSINESS

The Grossman family is to be congratulated on their very successful business in honey and related products. However, I would be more impressed with the article Flying on the wings of success (The CJN Feb. 3), were I to read that Billy Bee is to open a factory in joint venture with Israel to produce their highly marketable products in Israel. It is disappointing to learn instead that the company is at present fighting the naturally strong honey lobby in that country.

Israel needs investment and industry, not imports which will threaten its agricultural interests, and the large domestic and export market it now enjoys.

Phyllis Sugar
Toronto

Ron Csillag observes: The company is not fighting Israel's honey lobby. In fact, the opposite is true. It recognizes the honey lobby is strong and is not attempting to import honey.

Russia is no democracy

By RABBI W. GUNTHER PLAUT

In a recent column I shared with you my worries over the antics of the fast-rising "star" of Russian politics, Vladimir Zhirinovsky. He would be less to worry about if the climate in Russia were truly democratic, or anything approaching it. Unfortunately, that is not so.

While everyone seems to be sunk in admiration for President Boris Yeltsin, I have for some time wondered why such adulation is bestowed upon him. The fact is, that he has emerged as today's czar-like ruler of a vast domain.

In a recent article in Refuge, Tanya Basok and Alexander Benifand present a thoroughly researched analysis of the modern-day Russian autocrat. His victory in the September uprising of parliamentarians won him the admiration of Western powers and bolstered his virtually total control over the former Soviet Union. While the recent elections did not go the way he wanted, his own power has been barely diminished.

"Yeltsin is allowing numerous violations of human rights to occur and is creating a political environment conducive to state persecution of minorities. It seems obvious that Yeltsin aspires to extend his sphere of dominance not only to rebellious regions of the Russian Federation, but to all other former Republics of the U.S.S.R. One of his objectives is to re-establish the economic ties that existed in the former Soviet Union, but under even tighter central control than in the past. Another role in which Yeltsin's government sees itself is that of a gendarme of the C.I.S. Russia's attitude toward the rest of C.I.S. members is clearly expressed by Yevgeny Ambartsumov, former chair of the Supreme Soviet's Joint Committee on International Affairs and Foreign Economic Relations.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut

" 'As the internationally recognized legal successor to the U.S.S.R.,' he said, 'the Russian Federation should base its foreign policy on a doctrine delcaring the entire geo-political space of the former Soviet Union to be the sphere of its vital interests . . . and should strive to achieve understanding and recognition from the world community of its special interests in this space.' "

Basok and Benifand claim that under Yeltsin's leadership, Russian authorities have been providing military and financial support to breakaway groups of the former Soviet Union. The Russian military has been accused of using chemical weapons against Georgia in Abkhazia.

"Apparently, an increase in control over the former Soviet Union is not sufficient for Russia. Yeltsin wrote to NATO leaders urging them not to extend membership to Eastern European countries. Instead, he suggested that Russia and NATO should guarantee the security of Eastern Europe.

"The imperialist policy being pursued by Russia has the potential to intensify existing inter-ethnic and territorial conflicts in the former Soviet Union and neighboring countries. These countries have already experienced the trauma of displacement of people caught in the cross-fire. The further concentration of power in Moscow will in all likelihood complicate inter-ethnic relations in these and other regions of the former U.S.S.R., forcibly uprooting even more people in the coming months and years."

I have quoted this at length to show that the support which so many people in Russian have given to Zhirinovsky must be seen in the light of the current rulership of Yeltsin. He has accustomed his countrymen to strong-arm methods and to what amounts to a one-man rule. Therefore, contemplating the likes of Zhirinovsky is not outlandish for the Russian voters. If Yeltsin can't manage us, many of them appear to think, maybe Zhirinovsky can — and that makes the possibility of his success so much the greater.

Nepalese withdraw welcome mat from Israelis

By ALEXANDRA WALL

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Israeli music plays in the background. The waiters greet the customers, "Erev tov, Shabbat Shalom." Homestyle dishes on the menu include falafel, schnitzel and humus, and menus are frequently in Hebrew.

But locales like the Abu Rami restaurant in Kathmandu, Nepal, where Israelis had long felt welcome, are becoming more and more scarce as one of the most popular destinations among young Israeli travellers.

Drawn by the challenge of trekking in the spectacular serenity of the Himalayas, thousands of Israelis just beyond their army service flock to Nepal each year. But many, excited by the prospects of travelling abroad and seeing the world, are finding that a bad reputation has preceded them.

After a host of bad experiences in which Israelis have been accused of at best disrespect and rudeness and at worse of violence and theft, Israelis are finding it impossible to change their image here and are no longer wanted in this friendly country.

Iris Alfoar and Vered Lichter, both 22, were refused accommodations several times on the Annapurna Circuit trek, which has been most popular with Israelis.

Two incidents allegedly initiated by Israelis resulted in melees and have clouded the reception for Israelis.

"We had been walking all day," recalled Alfoar, who lives in Tel Aviv. "We finally reached a village and asked at a guest house for a room. The owner asked us where we were from. We said 'Israel,' and he told us there was no room available."

The two women, who ultimately found accommodations at another lodge, later learned that a Dutch couple who had arrived after them were given a room in the first guest house.

"I would like to say that this is anti-Semitism, but I know that it isn't," said Alfoar.

"The Nepalese, especially those in the villages, don't know anything about Judaism, or even the political situation in Israel. They only know about Israelis from the ones who come through here, and unfortunately a few bad incidents have ruined it for all of us."

Alfoar thinks that this treatment is unfair.

"The Nepalese are generalizing about all of us, based on the actions of just a few. From every country there are bad tourists and good tourists. I don't understand why they single out Israelis for this kind of treatment," she said.

"Guest house owners did not believe me when I said that I was Israeli," said Oren Golan, who came to Nepal with his American cousin.

"They would tell me, 'You're too nice to be Israeli,' or 'You order too much food to be Israeli.' " But the 25-year-old Givatayim resident is not the typical Israeli traveller in Nepal.

Golan waited until after finishing his bachelor's degree before heading to the Far East. He also chose to trek with a group of people from different countries, as opposed to the usual Israeli method of keeping to only Hebrew-speaking company.

"The average Israeli in Nepal is very young," said Ilan Maor, second secretary to the Israeli ambassador to Nepal.

"Most Israelis are released from the army, work a few months and then come straight to the Far East. This is the first time in their lives that they are free to do whatever they want.

"And because they are in a foreign country, they act as they never would in their own homes," Maor explained.

Both Israelis and Nepalese acknowledge that cultural differences account for some of the problems. Both also concur that a clash is inevitable because the brash, loud nature of Israelis is perceived as obtrusive by the meek and polite Nepalese.

Another explanation of Israeli behavior in Nepal is that the young men recently released from the army are still caught up in the macho military culture in which they have been immersed for the past three to four years.

Israelis in Nepal are known to constantly compete with one another, to prove who can push himself the furthest, carry the heaviest backpack, and climb the mountain the fastest. This kind of conduct is seen as the antithesis of the Asian religions, which promote non-violence and tranquillity.

But it goes beyond cultural differences, according to Subash Rai, who has worked predominantly with Israelis in his two years in the tourist business.

"I have been trekking when Israelis stop and urinate on our stupas (religious monuments), knowing that they are of religious significance for us," said Rai.

"They simply don't respect our customs or our culture."

Amar K.C., a student who works as a trekking guide during vacations from university, agreed.

"One hundred percent of Israeli people, I don't like," he said. "They complain about everything. They are never satisfied. They come here and act as if this is their country. They are stingy with their money. They lack dignity and character."

Lale Baha, who has worked as a trekking guide for seven years, said there is good reason why some guest houses bear signs saying, "No Israelis allowed."

Over the years, he said, he has seen numerous "tricks" that Israelis are famous for while trekking, from leaving without paying to stealing bedsheets.

But Maor, of the Israeli Embassy, countered that the majority of Israelis coming to Nepal each year cause no trouble.

Of course, he added, in a group of 5,000 or 6,000 people, "there are going to be 50 or 60 who might cause problems. And it is not our job to make excuses for them."

"But it is a very sensitive area for us," he continued. "Luckily these incidents have not affected our dealings with the Nepalese government.

Nepal was the first country in the region to establish ties with Israel. The two countries have enjoyed friendly diplomatic relations since 1961.

"But it is no less important to have good relations with the people of Nepal," Maor said.

The Israeli Embassy has made an effort to educate Israelis about Nepalese traditions and customs before they arrive in Nepal.

A letter from the embassy appears in the Hebrew edition of the most widely used guidebook, The Lonely Planet, warning Israelis to be respectful of the Nepalese, and the issue has been covered in the Israeli press.

Some Israelis have tried to change their negative image by staying longer and teaching English, for example, but these efforts remain overshadowed by the negative incidents.

Kids' birthday parties must be focused

By ERICA MEYER RAUZIN

My three children did me a great favor: they spaced their birthdays out equally through the year. I don't know what I would do if they all fell in the same month instead of, in turn, marking February, April and August.

It's not that I couldn't stand the excitement or the presents or the importance of the occasions; it's the parties I couldn't take.

We have just survived the fourth birthday party of our son. The undertaking included twenty children, four or five moms, two dads, assorted grandparents, two ponies and three schedule changes: one to assure that my father would be in town, and two to avoid conflicting with the parties of two other little boys in my son's nursery class, which pushed his party into March.

The party left my yard dripping with soggy crepe paper streamers, my driveway covered with chalk drawings, my garden threatened beyond all reason, my house scattered with cake crumbs (and just before we start Passover cleaning!), my wallet empty, my bougainvillea tangled with balloons, and my son bewildered with the onslaught of candy, presents and excitement. So was it a success? Of course! Can't you tell?

Just in case my litany of complaints makes you wonder, let me assure you this particular birthday party was a smash hit. The children had a great time and loved the food. The weather held up beautifully. The party service man arrived right on time with two docile ponies, both the color of good milk chocolate. And everybody had a good time, including the guest of honor. Any mother can tell you that this is not always the case. It far too often happens that Mom kills herself to throw a tremendous party for a child who spends the event sitting in a corner dissolved in tears and temper, totally overwhelmed.

But this is our third child, and we have learned something from the parties we've given for the other two. We haven't yet learned to stop giving birthday parties, but that light is beginning to dawn on me. I wonder if I could get away with shifting each kid to an every-other-year party schedule, and just bribe them outright on alternate years?

The main lesson we learned from an accumulated 10 years of experience with kiddie birthday fiestas is to focus. Limit the "idea" of the party to one thing. This process begins with the child. We asked our 4-year-old, "What do you want at your birthday party?" And he said, "ponies." And that is what we got. We did not get — as we might have been tempted to do when we were beginners at this — ponies plus a clown who made balloon animals, a cowboy who did rope tricks, and a complete rodeo. We just had ponies. And that was plenty.

We also learned that it is easier to give a little kid a party when you have bigger kids to help out. If you lack older offspring, nieces or nephews, hire a few. I couldn't have done this without my oldest daughter. After all, big kids have far more stamina than we do and they can devote a little extra attention to that inevitable child who ends up sobbing in the shrubbery because his slice of birthday cake doesn't have any writing on it.

Given past experience, we also knew to explain to our young guest of honor, well in advance, exactly what was going to happen, when and what was expected of him in terms of manners, participation and the general flow of events. This avoids considerable trouble later. For instance, our 4-year-old spent weeks asking when the ponies were going to come. I believe we saved ourselves a good bit of drama by telling him not only when they were going to come, but more importantly — despite all his wishes to the contrary — when they were going to go.

When his party wrapped up, and the ponies and the company went home, I collapsed with a leftover paper cup full of flat soda. I allowed myself to think, "Done, at last. No more birthday party." I pulled off my shoes and sat back, blissful and relieved.

As I began to doze, my daughter came in carrying a fistful of papers.

"What're those?" I asked, unsuspecting, peeking at her through half-closed eyes.

"Well," she said, "they're lists. I'm making plans. You know, we only have two months until my birthday party."

A woman's hard road to Judaism

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

She was registered as a Russian and brought up as one.

She was a church-goer.

She entered a convent and almost took her vows as a nun.

And now she is on the verge of becoming a Jew, having all but completed the requirements of giyur, the Orthodox conversion process.

Born in Rostov-on-Don 24 years ago, Inna Solovyov is of Jewish ancestry but of Russian nationality, a peculiar status she shares with hundreds of thousands of her fellow citizens.

More than 70 years ago, in the first flush of the Bolshevik Revolution, Inna's grandmother, now 90, wed a Russian man and changed the nationality in her internal passport from Jewish to Russian.

Inna's mother, Raisa, was raised as a Russian, and her late father, who was half Jewish, also considered himself Russian.

In her childhood, Inna was dimly aware of her Jewish origins. But that was about her only real link to Judaism and Jewish culture.

Inna might have been completely assimilated and lost to her people had it not been for two factors — anti-Semitism and her fervent belief in God.

By appearance, Inna is not typically Slavic. And in the ethnocentric atmosphere of Rostov-on-Don, a Cossack stronghold some 22 hours by train from Moscow, Inna's somewhat Semitic demeanor automatically singled her out as a Jew in the eyes of some her neighbors.

Occasionally, they would hurl racial insults at Inna. "Dirty kike" was one of their favorite epithets.

Ironically, perhaps, these incidents strengthened Inna's embryonic Jewish consciousness. "It made me feel stronger about my Jewishness," she said. "I had always been proud of my Jewish ancestry."

Despite her typically Soviet atheistic upbringing, Inna was drawn to God, and the Russian Orthodox church, from an early age. Her parents disapproved, but Inna went her way.

In 1987, when she was 18, she moved to the Baltic republic of Estonia and entered a convent. At first, she liked it. "I felt a lofty spirit there, and the people were really honest."

But on the eve of her confirmation as a nun, she had second thoughts, and backed away.

"I couldn't imagine living behind those walls," she explained. "I wasn't ready to devote myself just to prayer. It wasn't for me."

Yet Inna still sought to fill the void in her life. She did so by embracing Judaism. "It seemed closer to the truth than any other religion," she said. "I don't believe anymore in (Christianity's) conceptions."

Two years ago, having made her fateful decision to take up Judaism, Inna ventured into Rostov-on-Don's synagogue. "I felt something special. It made me feel Jewish. It connected me with 5,000 years of Jewish history."

At around the same time, she began reading Jewish books and newspapers.

Since then, Inna's life has undergone dramatic changes.

She is no longer a free-spirited bohemian, but a most serious-minded woman with definite plans.

In September 1992, she enrolled in Touro College's School of Jewish Studies in Moscow after two women's seminaries here rejected her application.

Touro College, a New York-based, fully accredited institution of higher education, provides its students with a BA recognized by Russia, Israel and the United States.

Inna is exceedingly pleased with her study program. As she put it:"Finally, I have first-class instruction in Torah, Talmud, kabbalah and Hebrew."

Inna will graduate in 1996, and with her degree, she will be a teacher of Judaism. Since all Touro students are obligated to remain in Russia for one year after graduation, she will teach in a Russian Jewish school.

In Moscow, Inna and her mother share a flat. She keeps kosher, cooks on her own stove and uses a separate set of plates. Inna's mother doesn't object to the arrangement, but isn't too keen about it either. "She thinks it's a passing fad," said Inna.

But Inna's embrace of Judaism is anything but transitory.

With the encouragement of her friends, Inna is now close to making giyur. It is, she observed, a "difficult and unpleasant" test, partly because she has been unable to convince the chief rabbi of Moscow, Pinchas Goldschmidt, that she is Jewish.

The official documents she needs as proof of her Jewish descent have been lost. Nevertheless, according to halacha and Israel's Law of Return, Inna is definitely Jewish.

Despite this problem, Inna is confident she will prevail and receive her giyur by the end of the year.

"I know in my heart I am Jewish. My commitment to Judaism is 100 percent. Nothing can change my mind. I want to be Jewish."

After her conversion, Inna will practice Orthodox Judaism and, hopefully, marry an Orthodox man.

Eventually, she will emigrate to Israel. "I've always wanted to be in Israel. It's a mitzvah to go on aliyah, though I haven't thought about it seriously yet."

Inna's older sister, who lives near Boston, has also expressed a desire to convert, as have some of Inna's friends.

Inna is optimistic that Russia's Jewish community, shattered by decades of communism, can be rebuilt. And she intends to make a positive contribution to its rebirth.

The Jewish World

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Nelly Kozhatova is now in London, having recently arrived to take up her studies at Leo Baeck College. She will live in Britain for five years on a full scholarship provided by the World Union of Progressive Judaism. When she graduates, she will go back home to St. Petersburg and become the first native-born female rabbi in the former Soviet Union.

I spoke to Kozhatova several weeks before her departure, and she seemed genuinely excited about the prospect of living abroad and making a contribution to the Jewish cultural and religious revival taking place in St. Petersburg.

Kozhatova, 21, has the looks of a model and the demeanor of a scholar, a combination that will not go unnoticed.

I met her at the office of the Maccabi sports club, where she had worked for the last little while. Her boss, Vadim Polyansky, is chairman of Maccabi's St. Petersburg branch and a mover and shaker in local Reform circles.

By North American standards, she has a rather unusual background. Kozhatova's mother, Chana Kogan, is Jewish. Her father, Alexsandr, a doctor-turned-businessman, is Russian.

Being of mixed ancestry, Kozhatova had the option of choosing Jewish or Russian nationality when she turned 16. In the old Soviet Union, everyone had an internal passport listing their nationality. You were Jewish, Russian, Ukrainian, Latvian or whatever. You had to choose.

"My mother decided for me. She thought it would be better for me to be listed as a Russian. It would be easier to get into university and find a job."

Her mother was right. In the latter half of its existence, state anti-Semitism, however subtle, was a demeaning feature of the Soviet Union. Persistently, Jews were denied equal opportunity in nearly all fields of endeavor. Communism, theoretically, abhorred racism. But the gap between theory and practice was exceedingly and disgracefully wide in the workers' paradise.

Not surprisingly, Kozhatova was the only Jew in her Russian history class at St. Petersburg State University. She is positive she would not have stood a chance of being admitted to that faculty had she been registered as a Jew.

Nelly Kozhatova first female rabbi

Although her internal passport and her Slavic appearance shielded her from anti-Semitism, she could not escape it altogether. The lecturer in one of her classes claimed that foreigners, among whom he included Jews, were historically responsible for Russia's ills. And, furthermore, he blithely declared that Jews were simply incapable of truly understanding Russian history.

Kozhatova was upset by his calumnies. But her faith in herself as a proud Jew was never shaken. At an early age, she had come under the influence of her grandmother, Riva, who had told her stories of Jewish festivals and how to conduct herself as "a Jewish woman." Kozhatova's mother, while familiar with Jewish traditions, did not practice Judaism. Yet she supported her daughter's decision to study for the rabbinate. On the other hand, Kozhatova's father was initially skeptical, but he changed his mind after being apprised of her rigorous academic program at Leo Baeck College.

Kozhatova intends to live in Russia upon her return. "I want to help build a Jewish community." She has visited Israel and considered aliyah. But having carefully thought about it, she has made her choice.

Kozhatova believes that at least two-thirds of the estimated 120,000 Jews of St. Petersburg will eventually leave, but not to Israel. "Israel," she said, "is a hard, somewhat Oriental country." The United States is their preferred destination.

In Russia today, there are some 25 Reform congregations, many in makeshift quarters, and five to six Reform rabbis imported from the United States, Canada and Israel. Kozhatova's congregation holds services on Friday nights at the Israel Information Centre. The Union of Progressive Judaism has promised Kozhatova a synagogue of her own following her smicha.

In the meantime, the Union provides the small band of Reform Jews in St. Petersburg with prayer books, kosher food and wine, an annual stipend and a rabbi on the High Holidays.

Israel's island of calm

By NECHEMIA MEYERS

Ulpan Akiva, the famous Netanya center for teaching Hebrew and Arabic, remains an island of calm in an increasingly stormy sea.

For at a time when continued violence has led to a serious deterioration in relations between Israelis and Palestinians, intercommunal goodwill, as I discovered recently, is still very much in evidence at the ulpan, headed by Nobel Peace Prize nominee Shulamith Katznelson.

She had invited me there to attend a party for her Golan Druze friends, who came despite the fact that they may soon be under Syrian rule once again. And as they know only too well, Syria is likely to play rough with them for being "too friendly" with the Israelis.

The celebrants also included Arabs from Gaza, Judea and Samaria who are at Akiva learning Hebrew, khaki-clad girls from the Israeli army who are there preparing to become teachers of Arabic and overseas students of both languages from China, Japan, Germany, Denmark, the United States and other countries.

All joined in the bilingual singing and dancing, a common phenomenon at Ulpan Akiva, where students not only celebrate and eat together, but also room with one another. The management insists that housing be mixed, as the result of which a right-wing Knesset member from Haifa may be sharing a room with a Fatah supporter from the West Bank.

One of the people at the party was Samira Srur, who is the inspector of Hebrew in Gaza and—under the guidance of Shulamith Katznelson — established two Hebrew ulpanim in the Gaza Strip. "Why," I asked her, "did over 7,000 Gazans decide to study Hebrew?"

"First of all," she replied, "it helped them in their dealings with the occupation authorities and particularly with the soldiers, who tended to be more gentle with Hebrew-speaking Arabs. Secondly," Srur continued, "it was useful to those looking for work in Israel or going for treatment in a Tel Aviv or Jerusalem hospital. Moreover," she added with a smile, "a lot of Gazans simply wanted to understand the programs on Israeli TV."

"With the withdrawal, will there still be interest in learning Hebrew?" I went on.

"Yes," Srur said, "because most residents of Gaza feel that there will continue to be some links with Israel, and that Hebrew will therefore remain important to them. The more optimistic even foresee the possibility of serving as intermediaries for overseas Arab businessmen who want to do business with Israel."

Katznelson, for her part, fervently hopes to go on hosting Palestinians in Netanya and visiting Hebrew ulpanim in Gaza and in the Golan as well. This will only be possible, of course, if there are good relations between Israel and her non-Jewish neighbors. But in the absence of such relations, warns Katznelson, no political settlement will work in any case.

Vancouver federation looks towards 'vibrant' future

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — The Vancouver Jewish community's potential to become "vibrant, learned, committed and involved is infinite but we have to work harder as a community if we want to come closer to achieving these goals," Peter Oreck, president of the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver said at the organization's recent annual meeting.

During the past year, said Oreck, the Federation worked in "positive ways to enhance the community." As a result of an external review last summer, the Federation adopted a more open nomination process, formed a Jewish Community Centre (JCC)-Federation task force to consider issues related to the long-term security of the JCC, and made a commitment to launch a community process to define the role of Federation.

Federation tried during the past year to act more as a facilitator and less as a controller. "The board didn't act until it knew there was a consensus of our community agencies and leaders . . . When it did act, it did so in concert with the agencies and leaders, allowing all parties to help create and carry out the initiative," said Oreck.

Oreck, who has completed the first year of a 3-year term, said developing new leadership is vital, and reported that under a new program, 64 young Jewish adults are training for future leadership roles.

He added that as a community, "we must consider how we relate and help an Israel now hopefully more at peace with its adversaries." He said the Federation's Israel affairs department is working with the Canadian Zionist Federation and others "to try and create a mechanism for our community in the lower mainland to participate financially, on a risk-taking basis," in Israel's new economic growth.

He said it is also essential to establish a consensus to help guarantee "a vibrant Jewish community in the British Columbia lower mainland 50 years from now. And our community must develop a financial resource plan which will allow its service deliverers to focus on delivery of service instead of day to day financial survival."

The report of the planning and allocations vice-president, Jonathan Berkowitz, said that the Federation has reversed the process of investigating the needs of the constituent agencies and then matching the needs. Instead, he said, "we allocated dollars equal to the amount raised in the previous year's campaign, instead of basing them on the campaign to come. We froze allocations at the same proportions as last year and began a process of revamping the entire allocations procedure. A task force will try to develop community-wide priorities."

The newest member of the Federation family is the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver Non-Profit Housing Society, Berkowitz reported. And the newest initiative is in the area of Jewish identity and continuity, with a committee chaired by Justice Bruce Cohen, with Arthur Fouks as honorary chair.

The financial report showed that revenue for 1993 totalled $3,758,292, which included $3,784,005 in campaign pledges. However, there is a provision for uncollectible pledges of $80,000. The campaign total in 1992 was $4,070,410, with total income of $4,075,716 and almost $99,000 set aside for campaign uncollectibles.

Allocations in 1993 included $1,256,229 for the United Israel Appeal of Canada, compared with $1,726,302 the year before. Local agencies were allocated $1,177,810 last year, compared with $1,150,868 the year before. Canadian Jewish Congress got an allocation last year of $264,794, about a $10,000 increase over 1992. The Council of Jewish Federations was allocated $56,492, compared with $54,762 the year before.

Sheila Anzarut, president of the women's division, said 230 women attended an education day held last February. The Jewish Business & Professional (B&P) Women's Group holds program meetings approximately every six weeks, featuring speakers on a variety of topics. A new B&P directory is presently being prepared and there will be new initiatives in public relations this year.

In the president's report, Peter Oreck paid tribute to the Federation's new executive director, Drew Staffenberg "for his competence and wisdom. Our community is much better for his presence." Staffenberg came to Vancouver last year after 10 years as director of the Federation and Jewish Community Centre in Calgary.

JIAS helps bridge the generation gap

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A program held last week to celebrate Purim helped bridge culture and age gaps in a creative way. Grade 6 students from United Synagogue Day School's Bayview campus and adult students from Jewish Immigrant Aid Services' (JIAS) English as a Second Language (ESL) classes, along with a small group of seniors from the Bernard Betel Centre, participated in the program held at the B'nai Brith Canada building on Hove Street, where the ESL classes are held.

During the more formal part of the program, the young students presented two skits about Purim, sang Purim songs and demonstrated Israeli dancing. JIAS teacher Barbara Pasternak, who co-ordinated the program, welcomed the participants.

Rabbi George Landeszman, an ESL student who immigrated from Hungary last August, brought a bit of Jewish history to life for the younger generation when he told his own life story.

Born in 1944 in a Budapest safe house established by Raoul Wallenberg, Rabbi Landeszman and his brothers were raised in a Jewish orphanage. He lost many relatives in the Holocaust, he said.

He knew he wanted to be a rabbi when he finished high school, Rabbi Landeszman told the students, but "at that time it was very difficult to practise [our] religion. We weren't even allowed to speak Hebrew."

He studied at the Jewish Theological Seminary of Hungary, where he obtained smichah in 1972, and went on to become the rabbi of the largest Conservative synagogue in Budapest.

"Our responsibility as Jewish immigrants," he said, "is to maintain our Jewish heritage and teach our children. This will enrich our future."

JIAS student Larissa Levitas expressed her gratitude for being able to learn more about her Jewish heritage in Toronto. In her native Moscow, which she left a year ago, she was afraid to say she was Jewish.

Another former Muscovite, Rafael Tsitalashvili, who immigrated seven months ago, delighted the audience with his polished, professional magic act, spinning his wand in the air without touching it and plucking flowers from the air or from behind people's ears.

Tsitalashvili, who had a magic theatre in Moscow, has performed in France and China with his wife Elena. They have won a number of international awards for their performances, and were gold medalists in last year's Pacific Coast Association of Magicians' competition. Torontonians may remember them from their 1990 performances at Ontario Place.

Following the presentations, the group of over 100 people divided into smaller groups to discuss their respective lives in Canada and in the former Soviet Union, where most of the ESL students lived before immigrating to Canada.

All groups included high-level ESL students to act as translators for the newer immigrants, one of whom had only been in Canada for three days. The youngsters wanted to know how the newcomers felt about leaving their former home to come to Canada; the immigrants had a lot of questions about how children in Canada spend their leisure time.

Roz Greenberg, co-ordinator of JIAS' ESL Program had told participants that the program was started about five years ago to help recent Soviet Jewish immigrants integrate smoothly into Canadian society. The program, which offers support, English classes and lessons in Jewish heritage, began with one teacher and one class. It has since expanded to 14 classes and 18 teachers, along with a number of volunteers and support workers.

JIAS aiding Ukrainians

Among Dr. Gur's other observations:

— The number of olim from the Russian region this year will remain between 50,000 and 70,000.

— One thousand children from the former Soviet Union have made aliyah without their parents.

— The election to Russia's parliament of the fascist-leaning Vladimir Zhirinovsky will heighten tensions between Russia and its neighboring states.

The Jewish Agency, the Israeli arm of United Jewish Appeal, has placed representatives in every corner of the former Soviet Union to assist and promote immigration to Israel.

In Toronto, close to one quarter of all new Jewish Immigrant Aid Service (JIAS) clients last year came from Ukraine on family re-unification applications, according to the agency's most recent data. There were 132 Ukrainian Jewish family arrivals in 1993, compared to 124 the year before.

"Our clients are telling us the old Ukrainian anti-Semitism is as strong as ever," says JIAS Toronto executive director Perry Romberg. "There's also a great fear that the whole region is polluted because of the Chernobyl nuclear 'accident.' "

For would-be Canadians, getting here from Ukraine isn't cheap and it isn't easy. The Immigration Department's application fee alone is $450 for an adult and $50 for a child. The $1,000 fee for a family of four represents a full year's salary for the average working person. Some knowledge of English, "even haltingly," notes Romberg, is a must, and the applicant must prove his or her professional qualifications are genuine.

JIAS, working through Canadian relatives or friends of prospective immigrants, assists with expert consultation from afar, and financial supplements, if necessary, when they arrive. Last year, JIAS' direct financial assistance to immigrants in need arriving in Toronto from around the world was $827,000 — funds provided through UJA donations.

Segal, MPP debate school funding issue

By MARA KOVEN
CJN Correspondent

Murray Segal

LONDON — Ontario currently funds the Catholic separate school boards. However law students, parents and interested members of this community came out to show their support for provincial funding for Jewish day schools.

Murray Segal, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress' (CJC) Ontario Jewish Association for Equity in Education and Dave Winninger, MPP for London South, debated the issue Feb. 8 at the London Jewish Community Centre.

Segal told the audience that CJC along with several other public and denominational school boards have sponsored an Ontario court challenge. It is currently in the court of appeals after Mr. Justice Anderson ruled in September 1993 that the situation is "unfair, inequitable and legal."

The CJC suit's aim was to broaden the school funding base to include other separate school boards including over 25 province-wide Jewish days schools. Anderson upheld the constitutional right of the Catholic separate school boards to receive funding.

Some of Segal's points included the importance of the Ontario Human Rights Code which grants free and equal rights to all people without discrimination based on religion, race, origin or color. Segal added that, "what I want for my child is no different than my Catholic neighbor...It is morally outrageous that parts of our community are being discriminated against," said Segal.

Winninger said, " I agree with about 90 per cent of what Mr. Segal has suggested and Mr. Justice Anderson would also agree." Yet, he continued, "our analysis differs."

Winninger strongly disagreed with Segal's statement that Ontario is the only province that directly funds religious education. Winninger pointed out that Newfoundland funds two private schools. He also said that Premier Clyde Wells has emphasized the economic hardship for the province to continue such funding.

"London has approximately 50,000 students and employs 4,500 teachers [not including the Catholic school board]." He cited monetary and social constraints as reasons other school funding could not be considered.

Both Winninger and Segal agreed that this issue should not be fought in the courts but in the legislature as a policy issue.

When Donna Glazer, principal of the London Community Day School, asked why government law didn't change to reflect a multicultural society, Winninger said, "The key issue here is [lack of] funding."

Winninger also added that the court's decision was not based on quality of Jewish education. In fact, he said the secular part of the school day has met and even exceeded public school standards. The province also has not found any discrimination in Jewish day school hiring practices; it is understood the schools need Jewish teachers to teach Jewish subjects.

Here in London there is one Jewish day school serving 69 students. Community members wanted to know how their small voice (2,500 Jews) could even hope to influence local members of parliament. Winninger and Segal agreed the best way to affect legislative change was to publish letters to the editor in local papers and to continually write members of parliament. "Your opinion is noted and tallied with others, so it can make a difference," said Segal.

JNF to honor B.C. Zionist

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — David Freeman, a long-time resident of Vancouver who has been active in the Zionist movement since his youth, will be the Vancouver Negev Dinner honoree this year. The event will be held April 20 in the Four Seasons Hotel.

As a special feature, the dinner will honor Norway and the memory of its late Foreign Minister Johan Hoist, in recognition of their efforts in helping arrange and hosting secret talks that led to the self-rule accord between Israel and the PLO. According to Jewish National Fund (JNF) officials here, Bjorn Kristvik, the Norwegian ambassador to Canada, will accept an award.

Guest speaker for the occasion will be Gad Yacobi, Israel's ambassador to the United Nations.

The honoree, Freeman, was born in Vancouver in 1913 and inherited his father's interest in Zionism. Although the Vancouver Jewish community was small before World War II, Freeman became involved in Zionist organizations such as Young Judaea and served as president of the local B'nai Brith lodge.

He got his BA from the University of British Columbia, studied law at Osgoode Hall in Toronto and was called to the Ontario bar in 1935. He moved back to Vancouver and was called to the B.C. bar the next year.

He has served on the board of the Canadian Bar Association, B.C. branch, and was president of the Vancouver chapter of the Weizmann Institute of Science. He was a co-chair of the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews and president of the University Club, and has been involved with the public relations committee of Canadian Jewish Congress. He was a member of the Joint Committee when Congress and the Zionist organizations worked together on community relations.

Since his childhood, Freeman has worked for the JNF and has visited Israel many times; he hopes to continue do so.

Appointed a Queen's Counsel in 1969, he still practises law on a somewhat restricted basis.

Gad Yacobi, a member of the Knesset for 23 years as a Labor representative, has served as a minister in a number of Israeli cabinets. He was a member of the special ministerial committee that made the decision to launch the famous Entebbe operation in 1976.

Reform appeal set

TORONTO — Representatives of the Canadian Reform Jewish community will meet at 6:30 p.m. on March 8 to launch the 1994 Combined Reform Appeal.

Speakers will include Rabbi W. Gunther Plaut, honorary campaign chairman, and Rabbi Allan Smith, director of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations (UAHC) Youth Division, who will speak on Our Children, Our Future. The evening will take place at the corporate headquarters of McDonald's Canada (off Wynford Drive).

The Combined Reform Appeal, now beginning its fifth year, is the annual fundraising campaign of Canadian Reform Judaism.

New Halifax rabbi has ambitious plans

Teen outreach, adult education on agenda

By JOEL JACOBSON
CJN Maritimes Correspondent

HALIFAX — Rabbi Shlomo Grafstein has ambitious plans as he assumes the pulpit of the Beth Israel Synagogue in Halifax.

Rabbi Grafstein wants to expand the adult education program, solidify the daily Hebrew School, work with teens in the community to give them an ongoing sense of Judaism, and build the synagogue into a community centre.

"I see the synagogue as a central place. If we learn more and more, we will grow. If the congregants see something viable here, they'll respond."

Rabbi Grafstein replaces Rabbi Oren Ismeiloff, who resigned from the Orthodox congregation last August after one year. Rabbi Grafstein becomes the third rabbi to serve the synagogue in the last three years. Rabbi Marvin Pritzker retired in 1992 after 17 years.

The newly-appointed rabbi was born in Toronto, educated at Ner Israel Yeshiva and received a degree in psychology at its branch in Baltimore before earning his master's degree in education and counselling at Johns Hopkin University.

He received his ordination from Rabbi Moshe Feinstein at Yeshiva Tiferes Yerushalayim in New York, was Hillel rabbi for 3,000 Jewish students at University of Florida in Gainesville, served as rabbi at Beth Jacob congregation in Oakland, Calif., and most recently was a full-time rabbi in India, serving Bombay and other cities.

"Twenty years ago at Gainesville, Rabbi Feinstein told me to deal with topics of Shabbat and aspects of faith. When I was in India, I taught the 13 principles of faith, discussed why we aren't like Christians or Hindus, what makes us Jews, what's our connection to Sinai."

Rabbi Grafstein, who joined the synagogue in late January, has already begun classes to teach people to read Hebrew in seven one-hour lessons. He will also instruct in understanding Torah and the prayer book.

"I will do prayer and Torah study in a pleasant way that can touch the soul and heart of a person to get them involved," he said.

And if people do not come to synagogue, the synagogue will come to them, said Rabbi Grafstein, who has sent flyers to his congregants containing information on the parshah of the week. "If there are 220 members and 10 per cent read it, it is 10 per cent more who might come to shul."

While not wanting to push congregants into religion, he wants to promote involvement. "We're the only daily minyan, morning and evening, east of Montreal. These people are being honest with themselves to do a little bit. Sometimes if you go too fast, you'll fall away and give the whole thing up.

"During the ages, our forefathers held on with tenacity. If they gave up because things were difficult, we wouldn't be here. We should try to do something we don't necessarily want to do."

In his first two weeks as the Beth Israel rabbi, he has recertified a local bakery as kosher, arranged for kosher cottage cheese to be made by a Nova Scotian manufacturer and been appointed chaplain for Jewish students at Dalhousie University in Halifax.

He has also accepted his mandate to represent the synagogue in the outside community by teaching a nutrition class of Mount St. Vincent University on the kosher code. "Prejudice falls away through contact," he said. "Showing non-Jews what we're about will hopefully educate them."

WHEELCHAIR ON TRACK

Discover the Difference

Savvy Shoppers Discover Off-Price Shopping

The revolution created back on a cool November day in 1953 highlighted the grand opening of Lawrence Plaza, slated to be the first, largest and most complete shopping centre in Canada.

Times sure have changed since then and the Plaza certainly is not the largest shopping centre any longer but the success story continues. Lawrence Plaza was one of the first shopping centres to introduce the off-price shopping concept in Canada a few short years ago and the trend was ignited. Today, incredible savings can be found at outlet centres across the country.

At Lawrence Plaza, first quality overruns and samples are sold direct to the public at everyday savings of 25-65 percent.

Most designers don't advertise or talk about these great 'fashion finds', so anyone interested in finding them needs to do some "well-worth-it" research. At Lawrence Plaza a large selection of designers and name-brand fashions can be found in a number of credible stores.

This Spring's colour palette is full of neutral, earthy and spice toned cloths. From Milan to Paris to New York, the designers have come up with countless variations of beige, tan and grey. This seems to reflect a renewed effort to offer friendly wearable cloths, which by the way, can often fit very nicely into existing wardrobes.

Look for the premier issue of "Plazette" - - the Lawrence Plaza Newsletter in your mailbox. You will find informative updates on stores in the centre and highlights on the fashion trends for the season. If you don't receive one in the mail, call (416) 789-1178 for a free copy.

Rabbi slams secularization of Israel; stresses importance of a Jewish state

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Israel must be a Jewish state, not just a state Jews live in, asserts historian, scholar and author Rabbi Berel Wein, rosh yeshiva of Shaarei Torah of Rockland.

"It is not the issue to build a state just like Venezuela, or even Canada. We must believe in what we know to be true: Biblical prophesy, the kedushah (holiness) and the special quality of Israel," he told nearly 100 people at Bnai Torah Congregation recently.

"We must create for ourselves an inner purpose; an understanding of who we are."

He slammed the secularization of the state, an outgrowth, he said, of the same process in general society.

Quoting Alan Blum, a professor at both the University of Chicago and Tel Aviv University, he said that man had to come to terms with love, G-d and death if he was to live comfortably on the earth.

"G-d was executed, His place taken by values, lifestyle, ideals; love is dead, replaced by sex and meaningful relationships; death with dignity is on its way to putting death to death."

These comments, he said, describe a Western society "so frightening we can't bear to look at it. We are preoccupied with toys and sports so that we don't have to look at reality."

The secularization of Jewish society (haskala) tried to take away the uniqueness of the Jewish people. "Secularists said we are no different from anyone else, and anyone who disagees is a bigot."

The Holocaust taught us, Rabbi Wein said, that the civilization of Beethoven and Schiller was bankrupt.

"We can believe that there is wisdom in the secular world, in places like Yale and the Sorbonne. But if people say that those places will make a moral world, that will secure the world for our children, don't believe it."

Zionism, he said, "came from a deeply felt religious idea. Zion, Kever Rachel, Leshana Haba'a BeYerushalayim — the Jews never really left Israel."

'Marx had supplanted Moshe'

He told the story of Rabbi Naphtali Berlin (known as the Neziv), the head of the famous yeshiva of Volozhin.

He persuaded the philanthropist Baron Edmond de Rothschild to plant grapes on the barren hills around Rishon L'Tzion. When Rothschild sent him the first bottle of wine, he put on his Shabbat clothes (before he drank it) "in honor of a bottle of wine from the Holy Land. We have all kinds of fancy wine now — he only saw a bottle of wine from Israel."

Theodor Herzl and Max Nordau, founders of the modern Zionist movement, were strangers to this religious love of Israel, Rabbi Wein said. "The British proposal to creat a state in Uganda was brought to the Third National (Zionist) Congress and the motion passed. Then Herzl died and nothing came of it."

The Eastern European Jews who followed Herzl, people like Chaim Weizmann, Ben-Gurion, opposed that proposal, "because they still came from the cheder. They saw in their hearts Bethlehem and Kever Rachel and Jerusalem."

The first generation in the state, he said, were like this, he said, describing how scholars, the Chief Rabbi and the head of the Jewish National Fund all davened in the same shul.

By the second generation, though, "Marx had supplanted Moshe."

The secularists "hijacked the idea of Zion. They combined it with socialism, utopianism and communism."

In 1986, Rabbi Wein said, 64 spies were caught, all spying for the Soviet Union, not for money, but for ideology, seeing it as the wave of the future.

"Today, baruch HaShem, spies only spy for money — that we can deal with," he added wryly.

The secularists created a "new person," he said, one with no identity with the exile, and who saw the past as worthless.

The net result, he said, is that there is "no holiness to the people, no G-d, and no land of Israel."

The prime minister of Israel, he said, "called the settlers [in the territories] an impediment. Ten years ago they were chalutzim (pioneers) — you sent them as the ideal of the Zionist dream, and now they are an 'impediment.' "

Batay Reena chosen for housing project

TORONTO — Premier Bob Rae recently announced the allocation of 60 community-based affordable housing units to Batay Reena Inc. The announcement was part of the allocation of 2,200 non-profit homes in Greater Toronto as part of the jobsOntarioHomes initiative.

Batay Reena is part of Reena, a social service agency founded in 1973, dedicated to providing support for adults with developmental handicaps through a network of services. Reena's partnership with provincial and municipal governments, private sector business and other agencies has helped to fulfil the dreams of over 200 Reena clients on a waiting list for supported housing.

"We are very pleased to have Danny Iannuzzielo, . . . president of Batay Reena, to guide us toward our goal with his expertise and commitment," said Sandy Keshen, executive director of Reena. "The Batay Reena community housing project will begin to meet the needs of the 200 clients and their families who have been on our waiting list since 1991."

Construction is scheduled to begin this fall. Batay Reena is looking at a number of site options within North York, conveniently located near synagogues, Reena day programs, and community resources used every week by Reena clients.

Batay Reena's project will offer its residents interactive living arrangements that are unavailable elsewhere. Supportive independent housing for the developmentally handicapped can be extremely difficult, if not impossible, to access. Placements from long waiting lists are rare. Batay Reena will allow clients to realize their full potential with dignity, through integration into the community.

JVS program helps immigrant professionals

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In his native Sarajevo, at least before the city came under bloody siege two years ago, Boris Kon never had to worry about such corporate concepts as downsizing, contract work and job sharing.

As a structural engineer, Kon, now 50, was in demand. He had 25 years of solid work under his belt, first in the petrochemical industry, then as an engineering firm department head, and finally as a construction management specialist on jobs around the world.

Now, Kon is doing volunteer work for a roofing company, even though his degree from Sarajevo University has been found to correspond to a Canadian Bachelor of Engineering.

For the time being, his rent is being paid by Jewish Immigrant Aid Services. But unless his luck changes soon, Kon and his family are looking at welfare.

In Toronto since last April, Kon has mailed out no fewer than 370 resumes, which led to six or seven interviews — and no offers of work. As unofficial leader of Sarajevo's Jewish emigre community in Toronto — about 25 families — Kon has also learned firsthand that years of professional experience can mean little in this economy.

That's why Kon joined 29 of his unemployed colleagues, recently arrived from the former Soviet Union, former Yugoslavia and Romania, earlier this month for a first-ever information session for foreign trained engineers, presented by Jewish Vocational Services of Metropolitan Toronto (JVS) and Holy Blossom Temple.

The program, aimed at providing immigrant professionals with practical job-search advice from those in the know, was the first of several JVS hopes to present for others, including physicians, lawyers, computer experts and teachers.

For the engineers at least, Ontario has proven to be a catch-22, the session heard. They must be certified by the Association of Professional Engineers of Ontario but before they can apply, they must have at least a year's experience working in this province.

The message the engineers received from two experts in the technical job market was to lower their expectations and do virtually anything to get their foot in the door, including drafting and even on-site labor.

But mainly, they were admonished to become what all firms seem to want: the multi-talented employee — flexible in several specialties, fluent in several computer languages and, above all, polished in both oral and written communication skills.

The presenters, Morris Tambor of the Technical Service Council and Basil Tambakis of a local Canada Employment Centre, agreed that, although the current situation seems dim, there will be a demand for engineers by the turn of the century, with 80 per cent of jobs expected to come from small and medium sized businesses.

That will likely be hailed by JVS, which maintains a roster of between 150 and 200 out-of-work engineers, a number sure to rise as professionals continue to pour out of the former Eastern bloc.

According to JVS executive director Ed Segalowitz, the agency has seen an increase in the number of immigrant professionals, particularly from the former Yugoslavia. Many, he said, have advanced degrees and most must requalify for practice in Ontario.

For Kon at least, the session proved something of a let-down.

"I need more concrete leads. I know that I need computer languages and I know how to behave at interviews," he later told The CJN.

A frustrated Kon is also discovering that many employers are ill-at-ease with immigrants, especially from a place that is receiving so much bad press.

In the meantime, "I'll keep trying," he sighs. "To start at zero at my age...I'm used to a better life."

Judaic collecting cards aimed at Orthodox

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Hank Greenberg, Sandy Koufax, Red Auerbach, Rabbi Moshe Feinstein, the Mishkan (Tabernacle) and the letter aleph all share two things in common — they're all Jewish and their images are all available on kids' playing cards. You know, the kind you used to get with an aromatic stick of rock-hard chewing gum.

In the Boro Park area of New York City, several Jewish businessmen with a talent for graphic design and computer art have issued a series of collecting cards geared primarily for young, Orthodox collectors. They're called "Judaic experience collecting cards" and they're billed as being "to the Jewish market what Score, Fleer and Topps are to the sports market."

But instead of the likes of Koufax and Auerbach, the cards produced by A.D.I. Marketing Group highlight Our Sages, The Mishkan, Synagogue, Jewish History and Mysteries of the Aleph-Bet. If you want Jewish sports figures, you'll have to look somewhere else.

The first series of 50 cards for the year 5754 has been available for a few weeks now, and so far consumers have taken to them like a hungry family to a meal of cholent and greben. Already, 200,000 cards have been purchased out of the original 300,000 distributed to retailers, said Richard Stone, one of the principals behind the company.

Stone, a graphic artist, said "people are intrigued with the high tech" look of the cards. "There are already cards out there, but they're lower quality."

Because he and his partners were already in the computer graphics business, Stone said they had the ability to produce the cards with the "secular quality" that kids have come to expect. At the same time as they present high tech, glossy artwork, the other side of the cards serves an educational purpose, he said.

The series on the sages presents a biographical sketch of the rebbe in question, while the cards on the Mishkan describe aspects of the early Hebrews' religious practices. Card No. 69, The Mishkan in the desert, for example, notes that "nearly 3,300 years ago, on the day after Yom Kippur, in the year 2,449 of creation, Moshe commanded the Jewish people to begin building the Mishkan. It was assembled as a temporary and portable dwelling for the Divine Presence of G-d among His chosen people."

Card No. 137, Aleph, notes that this letter "symbolizes the one and only G-d, creator of heaven and earth."

Stone said he and partners Nathan Szpilzinger and Shlomo Benzaquen began researching the cards' contents a year ago. They were aided by Rabbi Eli Teitelbaum, who supervised the gathering and writing of the information contained in the cards.

While the base clientele for the cards are young, observant Jews, Stone said secular adults also see them as an attractive addition to their collections.

The company expects to issue 200 cards per year. The second set of 50 is expected around Pesach, and this time it will address themes like the story of King Solomon and ancient Jewish coins.

Every year around Chanukah, A.D.I. expects to issue 200 gold-trimmed cards in a single set.

Rabbi S. K. Weinberg, principal of Eitz Chaim Yeshiva, has been invited by Torah Umersorah National Association for Hebrew Day Schools and the Stoliner Russian Organization to volunteer his expertise in the educational field as a consultant and to develop curriculum and teacher training for the newly established day schools in Kiev, Moscow and Budapest.

BAYCREST APPOINTMENT

Neil Goldenberg has been named president, Leadership Development Group, Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care. "Our goal is to increase awareness of Baycrest amongst our peers and raise money for progams which help improve quality of life for the elderly," says Goldenberg, 33.

The group organizes a variety of fundraising events such as an annual golf tournament, a hockey draft, a children's event and a lecture series. This past year it raised $175,000 for Baycrest, which was used to support various programs including intergenerational programs bringing children and the elderly together.

BIRTHDAY BASH FOR KIDS

Max Miller 3, and his sister Isanne, 4 enjoy a lollipop treat from their mom, Susan Miller, who co-chaired the successful Birthday Bash for Kids which took place recently at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care. More than 200 children came to Baycrest for an afternoon of games and entertainment and to bridge the gap between generations. The event was sponsored by the Leadership Development Group as part of the celebration of Baycrest's 75th anniversary.

CPAST helps parents deal with school system

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

Evelyn Bornstein

TORONTO — Parents of school-age children face a daunting task — trying to figure out how to facilitate their children's successful navigation through the educational system.

From helping kids improve their study skills to understanding how budget cuts will affect their education, parents themselves can use some help.

The Concerned Parents Assisting Students Today (CPAST) Network, a non-profit organization, was founded recently by Evelyn Bornstein to give them exactly the help they need.

The idea grew out of Bornstein's experience running a personalized tutoring and educational service called Explanations Unlimited. Bornstein, 30, has been its director since she founded it in 1988.

"What's typically happened in our private educational service," Bornstein told The CJN recently, "is that parents would call with a need to talk. Often by the time they called us, they were in utter despair and were looking for help not only for their children but for themselves.

"There's a terrible need for people to stop feeling isolated. A lot of parents don't know that what their child is going through is really common. A lot of parents know what they think their child needs, but they don't know where to go to get the help," she said.

CPAST's mandate, said Bornstein, is to provide information on educational policies and trends, offer support, and allow parents to network with others who share their concerns.

Bornstein emphasized that she doesn't want to duplicate the role of other groups such as advocacy groups or those dealing with specific problems such as learning disabilities. She is happy to refer parents to appropriate specific-interest groups and professionals.

In the wake of educational budget cuts and other problems plaguing the school system, Bornstein notes that CPAST is not out "to knock the school system. It's almost to take pressure off the school system. We understand budget cuts, etc., but we can't wait. After school hours, parents will make sure kids will get the extra help they need.

"Kids have to work much harder than previous generations to get to the same point as their parents," Bornstein said.

According to recently released statistics, minimum admission averages at the University of Toronto were 79 per cent for Arts, and 91 per cent for Pharmacy.

Because of the stress felt by many clients at Explanations Unlimited, Bornstein says that the first thing she and her staff do is to build a mentoring relationship with the students, so that they will feel more relaxed before they attempt the academic work.

Bornstein advises parents to guide — not force — their children; to listen to them and allow them to make some of their own decisions. "We recommend giving a preselected number of options, rather than saying, 'You must.' [You could ask] 'Would you like to do your homework before you watch TV or after an hour?' You can still have control, but you exert it in such a way that you're respecting your children."

She noted in addition, that parents "have to stay informed" about issues that affect their children's education.

CPAST's yearly membership fee of $25 includes a directory of services and professionals, a newsletter subscription, access to CPAST's reference library and free entrance to meetings twice a month. Bornstein also intends to put together workshops on subjects such as motivating children to excel in school.

Parents or educational professionals who would like further information about CPAST should call (416) 730-9323.

Kinesthetic techniques shown

TORONTO — Noted Venezuelan physical therapist Ramon Cuevas recently demonstrated his innovative kinesthetic stimulation techniques at Toronto's Zareinu Educational Centre.

Zareinu is a school and treatment centre for children with physical and/or developmental challenges.

School physical therapist Esther Fink says she became interested in Cuevas' methods after seeing a two-year-old child from Venezuela displaying far more strength and balance than would be expected from her specific condition, as a result of therapy she had received in Caracas.

Fink began to apply Cuevas' principles here in Toronto, both in Zareinu's early infant intervention program and in her private practice. Last year, she went to Caracas for hands-on training in the skills and intricacies of Cuevas' method of stimulating movement in infants and children.

Cuevas, Fink explains, uses reflexes and automatic responses to enhance motor function in children with Downs syndrome and a variety of other developmental and physical delays.

Cuevas believes that the earliest intervention possible is crucial in affecting children's development, by allowing them the independent movement needed to explore their environment.

These improved motor skills, Cuevas says, act as the vehicle for assisting the child in reaching developmental milestones.

Kinesthetic stimulation is designed for children facing such challenges as cerebral palsy, or neuro-developmental disorders.

Cuevas, originally from Chili, received his masters degree in kinesiology in 1969 at the University of Chili. Together with a neurologist and pediatrician, he opened the first early infant stimulation clinic in Caracas.

Volunteer program proves rewarding

By CAROL SEVITT
Special to The CJN

I've never taught a class in my life, and yet last summer I found myself teaching English to 16 students. I don't know a word of Russian, yet my students were primarily from the former Soviet Union. I can't speak Hebrew, yet my classroom was in Kfar Saba, Israel. As bizarre as this may sound, it was an incredibly unique and rewarding experience for both me and my students.

I went to Israel in July as a volunteer with the Yad BeYad Program, which is run under the auspices of The Israeli Forum and the newly-formed Canada-Israel Forum. The general goal of The Israeli Forum is to promote communication and co-operation between Israeli and Diaspora Jews through a variety of projects. The specific goal of the Yad BeYad program, is to teach conversational English to Israeli immigrants.

Why English? asked my friends incredulously, when I told them of my plans. The answer is obvious to anyone who has spent any time in Israel. English is widely spoken there, and both professionals and students require English for their work and study.

The Yad BeYad program was established last year by Loretta Helman, a Toronto career management consultant. It started with 20 volunteer teachers and blossomed to two groups of 34 this year, each going to Israel for two weeks. "It's been a peak experience on so many levels. Special friendships have been made and bridges have been built. At some level we belong in Israel — we want to share each other's lives," said Helman.

Her warm sentiments about the experience inspired me to go, but all the same, I found the idea of appearing at the front of a classroom for the first time very intimidating. As a writer I make my living using the English language, but would I be able to explain a dangling participle or define a misplaced modifier? I needn't have worried. When I saw the smiling faces and eager eyes of my students, all fear vanished.

Mine was an advanced English class, comprising half teenagers and half adults. For us all to get to know each other, I had students interview each other and then present their findings. It turned out that the adults were all highly educated. There was a physicist working as a teacher, four doctors (two employed, one retired and one unemployed), two engineers, and a computer programmer. My students' English skills were far better than I had anticipated, and the challenge was to find stimulating activities.

They loved debates and discussions where they could speak their mind. A heated debate about whether Israel should sacrifice land for peace gave me an insight into their political feelings — many were ready to give up land. A humorous discussion about today's teenagers showed me that kids are the same all over the world — they all love loud music and messy rooms. A conversation about the Israeli army brought admissions from two young Russian boys that they were afraid to serve.

(My heart went out to these kids because after two years in Israel they were still feeling rootless and melancholy. They knew they didn't belong in Russia, but didn't yet feel at home in Israel).

I soon became much more comfortable in my role as English maven and authority on life in Canada. Having lived in a communist country for most of their lives, the students were eager to learn about life in North America, and found many commonly accepted Western practices amazing. For example, they couldn't believe that we could return an item to the store if it didn't fit properly or if we changed our mind.

As the end of the two weeks drew closer, I developed a genuine attachment to my students and dreaded the day I would have to say goodbye. As homework and also as a memento for me, I asked them to write a paragraph on their feelings about the class. I quote two of them — spelling and grammatical mistakes included:

"I have taken many courses in my life. Also in English — but your course was the most joiful! It was the favourite course in my life."

"Thank you for your great effort to help us, as Jews and as human beings."

The other special people we had the privilege of meeting were The Israeli Forum volunteers. Each one of us was "adopted" by an Israeli family who opened their homes and their hearts to us. In addition to Shabbat dinners, we were treated to a private concert by a Russian string quartet, an art show and dinner in someone's home, and memorable tours of Tel Aviv and Jerusalem.

At a farewell party held in an Israeli Forum member's home, each one of us was given a beautiful mezuzah, hand-made by Ethiopian immigrant women, in recognition of our efforts. The mayor of Kfar Saba, Yitzhak Wald, addressed the group and emphasized the importance of our connection with Israel. "If you come here, you are a part of us. It's not only our place, it's yours also — even if it is part-time. We are partners in the same project, in building up Israel," he said.

The final English class was bittersweet for all the teachers. Several classes got together for a party and I felt like a proud parent as my students put on a humorous skit and sang a song in flawless English. When we returned to our classroom, my students presented me with a lovely gift and there were many hugs and kisses, and a few tears all around.

As I flew back to my real life in Canada, I carried with me many memories of some very special people — memories which I'm sure will last a lifetime.

Rabbi Schulman takes over as chaplain at Mount Sinai

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO —Rabbi Bernard Schulman recently assumed the position of director of chaplaincy services at Toronto's Mount Sinai Hospital. He succeeds Rabbi Sheldon Steinberg, who died last year.

Rabbi Schulman is no stranger to Toronto. While he earned his master of education degree at Loyola College in Baltimore and received rabbinic ordination at Ner Israel Yeshiva in the same city, he returned here to Ner Israel Yeshiva, first as a student, and later in teaching and guidance.

He was involved in chaplaincy services at Branson and Baycrest Hospitals.

For one year he was part-time regional director of the National Conference of Synagogue Youth (NCSY).

Rabbi Schulman sees the role of chaplain as giving assistance and support to patients, their families and hospital staff.

He stressed that, while he doesn't force his attentions on people, he makes it known that he is available for anyone who wants counselling, prayers, or just someone to talk to.

The appearance of a clergyman may be frightening to some, especially the unaffiliated, he said. "Some people think if a rabbi or any other clergy comes to see them, they must be really in bad shape."

Since he is around so much of the time, his dropping in seems more natural.

Rabbi Bernard Schulman

Rabbi Schulman believes that the traditions of vidui (confession of sins), kaporah (atonement) and teshuvah (repentence) can be instruments of healing and a means of removing stress both from the patient and, often, from the family as well.

"It lets him live — or die — at peace."

People should not hesitate to ask to see him, or to contact their own shul to let them know they would appreciate a visit, Rabbi Schulman says. As well, he would like rabbis to feel free to refer families and patients to him.

"People shouldn't feel they are burdening the clergy."

Rabbi Schulman stressed that it is not the chaplaincy's responsibility or duty to judge patients. "Our job is to help them, support them, and assist in their recovery, to support them as people. Their religious level or lifestyle is not at all an issue."

The rabbi noted that he is also willing to speak to patients and their family after the hospital stay, and to help in any way he can.

In a hospital like Mount Sinai, a Jewish chaplain has a special role, particularly, he feels, with the elderly. "If one can speak to them in the language of their youth (Yiddish) you can touch them at a different level."

He feels a strong responsibility to work with the staff as well.

"It's not easy to work in a hospital with sick people, when the outcome of hours of work and effort may not be successful. The staff has to deal with their own feelings about that.

"People don't always realize how personally involved staff become with patients. They need support too."

The staff can also refer patients and their families to the clergy staff. "We work as a unit," Rabbi Schulman said, adding that, when it is appropriate, he sits in on meetings to discuss a patient's welfare.

While Rabbi Schulman is the director of chaplaincy services, the hospital also has Catholic and Protestant chaplains available.

Although he has been on staff only since January, he has definite goals in mind. He wants "to make people more aware of the availability of chaplaincy services. And I am working with different programs to upgrade the services to patients, their families and staff."

There is a daily Mincha service ("more for staff than for patients") and holy day and yizkor services.

At the interview, the rabbi was busy arranging Purim megillah readings. Students from local yeshiva high schools, as well as other volunteers, were coming to give shlach mones and help with the services.

"You have to give the kids credit. They will be coming all the way downtown, even though they are fasting all day!"

He is proud of the fact that he arranged for more kosher food to be available in the hospital cafeteria. And some patients don't realize that they have to ask for kosher food — that all the food in the hospital isn't kosher automatically.

Rabbi Schulman is the father of six children, aged seven to nineteen. His wife, Malka, is an administrator and teacher at the Toronto School of Business.

Symposium to probe hatred in Canada

WATERLOO, Ont. — Academics are going to stare into the ugly face of hatred in Canada and ask questions at a public symposium at Wilfrid Laurier University on Friday, March 4. Nine leading experts will explore the current manifestations of hatred and how it can be prevented during the day-long event, The Legacies of Fascism in Canada.

"Hatred is more pervasive in Canada than we want to think," says Iwona Irwin-Zarecka, a professor of sociology and co-organizer of the event. "We must expose it. We have a responsibility to take action."

The first of two sessions will examine some of the roots of fascist support, anti-Semitism and racism in Ontario, Holocaust denial, and challeges to multiculturalism. The second session will explore strategies to prevent hatred from arising or spreading, through education, research, legislation, and the courts.

The symposium is being organized partly in response to racist incidents in Kitchener-Waterloo. It is sponsored by the interdisciplinary research committee and the Office of Graduate Studies at Laurier.

The event will run from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. in the Paul Martin Centre on campus.

Alice L. Eckardt, one of the pioneers in the area of post-Holocaust reevaluation of Christian theology, will present a lecture of the eve of the symposium. Her presentation, entitled The Christian and Jewish Story: Reflections of a Christian Historian, will begin at 8 p.m. on Thursday, March 3, in the John Aird Centre recital hall.

Basketball coach sees comeback among Jewish athletes

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — As far as Mike Katz is concerned, the "golden era" of basketball in Canada dates back to the late 1960s and early '70s — at least from a Jewish point of view.

If you checked the rosters of university teams in Toronto, you'd find them stocked with players like Ivan and Michael Betcherman (they're cousins), Jack Pascht and himself. Furthermore, lots of young Jews played the game at less competitive levels, and they could look to the examples set by Red Auerbach and Dolf Schayes in the United States for inspiration.

After a hiatus of about 20 years, basketball seems to be making a comeback among young Jewish athletes, Katz believes.

The longtime head coach at Humber College where he's won three consecutive national championships from 1991-93, Katz said York University has had a lineup that included Alex Brainis, Jeff Raphael and Oren Littman.

Furthermore, Canada's 1993 Maccabiah Games basketball team, which he coached, was led by Seth Adler, a guard from the University of Lethbridge who was a conference all-star out west, and by Roberto Feig, a Jewish Community Centre alumnus who played on two national championship teams at Humber. Brainis was also on the team.

Katz, a native of Toronto, is heartened by the apparent renaissance in basketball among Jewish athletes. He's also optimistic that, with the introduction of the NBA in Toronto, the local franchise may give the sport a badly needed boost of funding to help develop star players.

"The boom has happened," Katz said recently. "The NBA provides the stability and will ensure that the boom is not a fad or a passing thing. It will entrench it here."

For Katz that can only mean more raw material to work with, to hone and improve. At 44, Katz has been coaching for 18 years, beginning at George Harvey High School where he registered a fair amount of success. He led the school to two Metro championships and to two Ontario-wide competitions.

In 1983 he moved to Humber College, though he continued to teach economics and accounting at the high school level. In his 11 years at Humber, he's led the team to four provincial championships, three national titles and one second-place finish at the 1988 nationals.

Last year, Humber tested itself against three university teams, beating Windsor and Ottawa while losing to Guelph.

Thanks to good recruiting, Humber has been able to put together a talented lineup that competes regularly with NCAA Division 2 and 3 schools. Oddly enough, coaching talent can be more difficult than teaching less accomplished players, Katz maintains. Expectations are much higher and the pressure placed on a coach handling a talented lineup can be extreme, he said.

Success with a team sport like basketball "requires the players to sublimate their abilities to fill a team need," Katz says. "Every team needs one guy on defence, two shooters and two passers. Selling that is tough since players look to scoring first."

In addition to pushing the team concept, Katz said the most difficult aspect of coaching is dealing with the swelled heads of some top athletes. "Their egos need constant stroking," he said.

After 11 years at Humber, Katz has clearly hit on a winning formula. And that hasn't gone unnoticed in basketball circles. He's been chosen as one of three assistant coaches of the Canadian national team that is gearing up for next August's world championships in Toronto. That competition will feature Dream Team II, consisting of NBA stars.

Canada too will benefit from NBA talent with Rich Fox of the Celtics and Bill Wennington of the Bulls playing key roles for the home side.

Other top countries that will participate in the tournament hail from Argentina, Brazil, Greece and Germany. Katz is optimistic that Canada, led by its marquee players, can finish in the top five.

By BILL GLADSTONE

New Age Travel: You've just arrived in a city you've never visited before. You pick up the rental car at the airport one hour before your business meeting across town. Fortunately, the Apple Newton computer in your briefcase is equipped with the Fodor's '94 Travel Manager intelcard. You enter your present location and the address of your destination and — presto! — detailed driving instructions appear on the postcard-sized screen.

One of the first pieces of software designed for the Newton, Fodor's Travel Manager provides navigational directions and the equivalent of hundreds of pages of information for eight major U.S. cities including New York, Boston, San Francisco and Los Angeles (pre-earthquake). The software can help you find a specific service — bookstore, restaurant, museum, theatre — then give directions how to get there. "Press a button and the location appears on a map," says Fodor's editorial director Michael Spring. "You can even zoom in to get more details. The machine gives detailed instructions on how to travel between virtually any two points in a city."

Software prototype used in Japan

Fodor's, a division of Random House, publishes a line of more than 160 travel guides. The company is now compiling computerized guides to other destinations, including several Canadian cities. "The only problem," says Spring, "is that you won't be able to get lost anymore." But who wants to? As Spring points out, time and money are especially precious during vacation time, and travellers try to wring the most from every moment. "People take off for two weeks of the year and it's something they dream about for the other 50 weeks. It's very costly and they don't want to waste time getting there. So I think this kind of information service will become very popular."

Fodor's software is being developed for possible use in any in-car navigational system that emerges in the future. Utilizing a small screen placed on the dashboard, such a system would display your changing position on a map, as monitored by a satellite in earth orbit, and advise you of the best route and estimated travel time to your destination. One prototype is now in use in Japan and another is undergoing field-testing in Orlando, Florida.

Service helps business travellers

Another New Age travel product from Fodor's is the Worldview Travel Update. Customers indicate their destination, travel dates and up to eight of 16 interests, then phone, fax or mail in the order. Within 48 hours they receive personalized Updates by fax or return mail. They contain up-to-the-minute information on theatres, concerts, sports events, exhibits, children's activities, nightlife, dining, business services and so on. "It's a customized 16-page booklet, telling you what's on in any of 160 destinations around the globe, on the very days that you're going to be there," says Spring. For purchasers of Fodor's guides, the service costs $7.95 (US) plus delivery, with reductions for multiple orders. Order forms are found in Fodor's guidebooks.

New Age Travel, Part II: A Toronto company has introduced a service to help Canadian business travellers choose appropriate gifts when visiting associates in other lands.

"Busy executives lack the time to carry out the necessary research required in order to present the correct gift," says Patti Goldberg, co-owner with Barbara Thompson of Portfolio Contemporary Art Impressions Inc., 130 Spadina Ave., Toronto. Using the Portfolio Helps You Travel service, travellers to Japan (for example) are advised to present gifts with both hands and only at the end of a visit, to match the value of a gift to the status of the recipient, and to avoid decorating a gift in white or red as these colours are associated with death and funerals. In Mexico and Brazil, avoid giving anything purple for a similar reason.

Portfolio provides a range of native and contemporary art, stationery, desk accessories, ceramics and glass products. Most are made by Canadian artists using Canadian materials like Quebec jade and Ottawa Valley marble. For more details, call (416) 366-7787.

* * *

New Age Travel, Part III: Small and shiny, CD-ROM disks contain volumes of multi-media information, accessible through a CD-ROM player linked to a computer. Several CD-ROMs of interest to travellers are now available in software stores. Both the Toolworks Software Traveller (based on information from Frommer's Guides) and the Key Action Traveller (published by Softkey Software) cost about $30 each.

Softkey's product offers sights, sounds, brief videos and printed information on countries around the globe — more than 1,000 travel adventures in all, from jungle treks in Bhutan to desert survival seminars in the Negev. Since the medium is still in its infancy, the audio and visual components are not overly impressive. The meat of the package is the hard information about climate, location, passport requirements, consulates and specific adventure tours. It's interesting, succinct and thorough. However, this is exactly the sort of stuff available free from travel agents, tour companies and national tourist boards. As well, there's no date anywhere in the package and no way to tell whether the descriptions and prices listed are still current.

Stereotype charge forces show to close

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A dance show intended to bring blacks and Jews together was cancelled when a black North York woman councillor complained that it promoted harmful stereotyping.

People Like Us, a joint project of Ballet Creole and Me'Irim Dance Company, was withdrawn when two black dancers declined to go on, the day before the 45-minute show was scheduled to run at Harborfront Feb. 14-19.

There was no time to train replacements.

Ballet Creole director Patrick Parson refused to name the North York politician who made the complaint. Both Parson and Shula Saltzman, Me'Irim director, said they disagreed with the complaint and vowed they would stage the show again.

The objection was based on a dance between characters representing Aunt Jemina and Shylock and on performers eating watermelon and matzo balls.

"We used Aunt Jemina and Shylock as the epitome of stereotypes to show how ridiculous they are," Saltzman told The CJN. Parson danced the part of Shylock and a white woman, Dora Ladas, danced as Aunt Jemina. Saltzman said the food scene was an attempt to show how different cultures like different foods.

Although People Like Us was withdrawn, the rest of the Ballet Creole production Pourquoi Pas?, also on multicultural themes, went on with a substitute number. But Parson said the negative publicity cut into attendance deeply and only 30 people attended the Feb. 17 showing. "This is the first time in our history that we haven't had a full house," he said.

People Like Us previously had four performances at the North York Performing Arts Centre and two at an original theatre festival at the University of Toronto. "We had only positive feedback," Saltzman said.

However, she said she heard that one politician, who had not yet seen the show, was raising ojections. Eventually, that person did attend and raised the objections anew. "A lot of negative feeling began to surround the production after the complaint."

Saltzman described the process of bringing the black and white performers together to show the common experiences of Jews and blacks as a learning experience. "We had to learn to call each other names, ugly and hurtful names and they were difficult to say."

The text for People Like Us was written by Malca Litovitz, after interviews with the dancers. The show is performed by four Ballet Creole dancers, four from Me'Irim, three narrators and three musicians, the latter from Ballet Creole.

A Musical Feast at shul

By JACK KOHANE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — A Musical Feast, the first major concert presentation of 1994 at Beth Tikvah Synagogue was everything it promised to be . . . and more.

The audience was treated to some of the very best musical talent now performing on the Canadian concert circuit. Dedicated to Jewish Music Month, the evening gala also served to launch Beth Tikvah's three-part concert series.

"Music is alive at Beth Tikvah," said Srul Glick, the synagogue's composer-in-residence and choir conductor for the past 25 years. "Our major thrust has been, and will remain, music produced by Jewish composers. Styles range from traditional to modern." Noted for his contribution to chazzanut and chazzanim, Glick has been composing music for the synagogue for much of his life. In 1993, he received a Governor General's Award for his contribution to Canadian culture, and recently was given an Honorary Fellowship from the Royal Canadian College of Organists for his contribution to musical life in Canada, and to the music of the synagogue in particular.

The lilting tones of the Beth Tikvah choir moved the audience from joy to tears with their special renditions of Chassidish, Unter Di Shneyen (Under the Snow), A Loshikl (A Pony), all poems with allegorical imagery set to music composed by Glick.

The loudest round of applause was reserved for guest cellist Denis Brott, one of Canada's most distinguished artists. Brott has performed in the finest music halls around the world and has received many awards, including 2 Junos and a Grand Prix de Disques. To see him play is to witness a master at work. For Three Fantasy Pieces for Cello and Piano Op. 73 by Schumann, Brott's fingers flew across the strings, sending tingles up our spines. His Rasch Und Mit Feuer was unequalled in my experience; the cello seemingly sang a fiery aria under Brott's command.

Later, Brott and the Beth Tikvah joined forces for the Canadian premier performance of Glick's Shirat Hanefesh Friday Night Service II (Song of the Heart), a compilation of major Shabbat Prayers commissioned by Temple Israel in Teaneck, N.J., and first performed there in 1992. The combination of choir, cello, Cantor Efraim Sapir, flute, clarinet and piano made the walls of Beth Tikvah reverberate with the dramatic interplay between voices and instruments. It was an acoustic assault that brought us to our feet when the concert drew to its thunderous climax.

The next musical offering from Beth Tikvah, which promises to be equally exciting, entitled From Ragtime to Bernstein, is scheduled for March 13.

BILL GLADSTONE'S EYE ON ARTS

Terezin (Theresienstadt) was an 18th-century fortress town in Bohemia, about 60 km north of Prague, that the Nazis used as an assembly and transit camp for Czech Jews, beginning in 1941. The initial idea was that Terezin would be a "model camp" where elderly Jews, decorated war heroes, and prominent artists could be imprisoned in "comfortable" circumstances.

It might be more accurate to say that Terezin was conceived as a propaganda scheme designed to fool both the Jews of the Third Reich and the outside world about the true intended fate of the Jews. The Nazi propaganda film Der Fuhrer schenkt den Juden eine Stadt (The Fuhrer Gives A City to the Jews) was produced to convince the International Red Cross that Terezin was a happy spa. Camp inmate Kurt Gerron, a well-known actor and director, was forced to make the film. Afterwards, he and most of the film's cast of prisoners were shipped to Auschwitz to die.

On Sunday March 13, The Fuhrer Gives A City to the Jews is being screened in Toronto during a unique evening of music and film entitled Lost Composers: Music From Terezin. Staged by New Music Concerts at Harbourfront Centre's duMaurier Theatre Centre, Lost Composers: Music From Terezin features the work of Czech composers Gideon Klein, Hans Krasa, Viktor Ullman, Pavel Haas and Rudolf Karel in a performance by the Accordes String Quartet. Each of the five composers featured died before the war's end.

The program starts at 7:15 p.m. with Brundibar, a film of the children's opera by Hans Krasa, followed by the concert at 8 p.m. Tickets are $18 ($9 for students and seniors). Phone (416) 973-3000.

Almost a quarter century ago, David Mayerovitch of Toronto was a young wunderkind who was brought in as a writer for The Ed Sullivan Show in New York. That was 1970, the show's last year on the air — Mayerovitch, of course, had no part in its demise.

Since then, he's written many CBC and other television shows. He wrote several episodes of the well-remembered show King of Kensington, featuring Al Waxman. Today, he's a busy script writer and consultant working on the development of several large projects. As well, he continues to teach at the University of Toronto's School of Continuing Education. Due to popular demand, a new session of his eight-week course Camera Language: Script Writing For Film and Television begins March 29. It runs every Tuesday evening, 7 to 9:30 p.m.

The course, which focuses on the principles of screenwriting, is meant for the budding author who may have an unpublished novel or unproduced screenplay tucked away in a drawer somewhere. For further information, phone (416) 978-2400.

International Notes: Forty little-known works of Marc Chagall, created in his native Russia between 1908 and 1920, have been loaned by Russia to the Jewish Museum of Vienna, where they go on display March 11 to June 12.

Most of the works come from the Jewish State Chamber Theatre in Moscow, where Chagall painted them as murals. The main piece, Introduction to the Jewish Theatre, is three metres high and eight metres long. During the time that Chagall was considered a decadent artist, these murals were removed from the theatre and stored in Moscow and St. Petersburg. The display also includes paintings in which Chagall captured the shtetl atmosphere of the city of Witebsk.

The United States Holocaust Memorial Museum is slated to receive the American Institute of Architects (AIA) 1994 Honor Award for Architecture, the profession's highest recognition of design excellence for individual buildings.

"Precisely controlled and often deliberately unsettling, the [Museum] masterfully employs the power of architecture to evoke the raw emotion of unspeakable human tragedy," said the AIA jury. The jury also noted that the Museum is located just a few blocks from America's most significant monuments to freedom and "stands as an unflinching witness to the horrors that can be unleashed in the absence of democratic ideals and as a reminder of the necessity of vigilance." Since it opened last April, the Museum has received more than 1.4 million visitors.

Delancey not worth crossing

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

Carol Lempert as Izzy (left) and Lillian Lewis as Bubbie in Crossing Delancey, now playing at the Leah Posluns Theatre. [John Currid photo]

TORONTO — First, a tip when seeing a play whose popular movie version came out several years ago: try to forget the movie.

It's not only that one can't shake comparisons to Amy Irving and Peter Riegert, who played the leads in the 1988 film; it's that the film, using the same script by Susan Sandler, succeeded in underscoring the whole point of the exercise: the clash between the old and modern Jewish worlds and why crossing the symbolic boundary of assimilation — Delancey Street on New York's Lower East Side — whether one way or the other, is among the great challenges facing modern Jewry.

The movie (remember: try to forget it when seeing the play) had an obvious advantage: the ability to fit the teeming, bursting-with-Yiddishkeit Lower East Side into the story. We can practically taste the wares Sam the pickle man peddles from his booth. The Judaism in the film is everywhere. It envelopes you like a favorite old sweater. But it poses a quandary too: which way to cross the street, and why?

The stage version is content, it seems, with a watered-down, one-dimensional view that avoids the bigger picture. Missing, notably, is the flavor, the warmth, the whole tam that made the movie a small gem.

Fleshing out the story is necessary because the plot itself is on the thin side: Bubbie (Lillian Lewis), an archetypal Jewish grandmother who actually says "oy vays mir," is after her devoted but shy, mid-20-ish granddaughter Isabelle (not played feyly enough by Carol Lempert) to get married. Isabelle, or Izzy as she likes to be called, has a crush on a very goyish writer (Damon Redfern) who frequents the bookstore where she works.

To the rescue comes community shadchan Hannah (well played by Joyce Gordon), loud, brash and with healthy appetite, who matches her a match with Sam the pickle man (the best performance of all by Alon Nashman, who plays Sam with the right mix of nerdiness and heart).

The rest is pretty much straightforward: Sam's struggle to win Izzy's interests, Izzy's dream-come-true and subsequent disappointment, with plenty of shtick thrown in from Bubbie and Hannah.

Director Lawrence Seligman keeps things moving, but too many live set-changes, especially in the first act, make proceedings seem like a series of piecemeal vignettes.

Full marks go to set designer Samantha Burson for an ingenious split set.

Problems, attributable perhaps to opening-night wrinkles, include a barely audible voice from Bubbie, who should be practically shouting. As well, Lewis's lines are funny enough; she doesn't have to be funny saying them.

Since the audience has such restricted access to Izzy's life, which she keeps insisting is fine as it is, we are left to figure out for ourselves why she chooses to navigate the street as she does.

Call it Crossing Delancey Lite.

Play moves along briskly

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A feisty American Jewish ex-mother-in-law says the most important thing in marriage is to be well matched in Scrabble. A Canadian prairie mother wonders where the Third World is, since she missed the other two.

In If We Are Women presented by the Canadian Stage Company at the St. Lawrence Centre until March 12, Rachel Cohen and Ruth McMillan are worlds apart. Cohen is an agnostic intellectual, while McMillan grew up hiding the fact that she couldn't read or write. What they have in common is a daughter/daughter-in-law who was married to Cohen's son, Gerald, but is now divorced. The two women come together to offer their help at the seaside home in Connecticut of the daughter Jessica (Diane D'Aquila) whose second mate has just died.

The plot is not unlike the life of Saskatchewan-born playwright Joanna McClelland Glass, who was married to a Jewish academic in the United States, and is now living in Toronto.

The Cohen and McMillan characters, played magnificently by Rita Howell and Patricia Hamilton, are a gold mine for writer Glass.

The distilled wisdom of these two women is not quite enough to deter Polly from her decision to abandon Yale and move to a Colorado farm with the young n'er do well of her one-night stand.

All in all it makes for a good night of drama.

Director Susan Cox moves If We Are Women along briskly and the set design by Mary Kerr is entrancing. But things fall apart at the end when an over-long finale has the players repeating their favorite lines ad nauseum. Michel Tremblay can pull this off, but it doesn't work in If We Are Women.

Books

By BERNARD BASKIN

Mercy Of A Rude Stream by Henry Roth (McClelland & Stewart $29.99)

Almost sixty years ago, Henry Roth wrote a novel entitled Call It Sleep. It was his first and only book for six decades. Appearing in 1934, this story of a poor Jewish boy growing up in the midst of a pre-World War One immigrant family, in the shtetl-like security of New York's East Side, was largely overlooked. It was only in the 1980s, when the book was praised by a number of eminent critics and republished in paperbound form, that it became famous and sold millions of copies.

What was distinctive and surprising about the novel was the author's use of Joycean language and techniques mingled with biblical symbolism. In his own inchoate, inconclusive way, David Shearl seeks to break away from a tightly knit immigrant world and a tyrannical, anxiety-ridden father.

He experiences an incandescent moment in Hebrew school when he is taught the passage from Isaiah, in which the prophet has his lips touched with a live coal in preparation for his mission. David, too seeks change and illumination. This he does when he takes a metal milk dipper in his hand, strikes it against the third rail of the trolley tracks and severely burns his foot, an act of desperation that relocates him in the life of his family and makes possible a more favorable father-son relationship. David can now grow and develop for the coal (the milk dipper) placed by the angel in his hand has achieved its purpose.

During his long period of almost total literary silence, Roth found employment as a tool and gauge maker, a schoolteacher, a psychiatric attendant in a state hospital, a waterfowl farmer, and a sometime Latin and math tutor. But over the past 15 years he has resumed writing and now at the age of 87, has announced that he has six related novels ready for publication, of which the book under review is the first.

In Mercy of a Rude Stream, we follow the adventures of Ira Stigman, starting at the age of eight through his fourteenth year. Precocious Ira is growing up in a largely Irish Harlem neighborhood, to which his family has moved; he is unhappy about having to leave the familiar and comfortable all-Jewish Lower East Side. He now has few Jewish friends, Hebrew school is discontinued and the coming of World War One is emotionally upsetting as his uncle is drafted and sent abroad to fight in Europe.

He finds work at a grocery store and has his hands full warding off Irish bullies and a number of pederasts, and coming to terms with his burgeoning sexuality. The book ends with Ira at fourteen, buffeted by poverty and discrimination, but alive to new possibilities and rewards.

Unlike the previous novel, Mercy of A Rude Stream is written simply and briskly, with a minimum of plot, and Roth is effective in evoking the time and place of his own youth.

A surprising literary device is used in the numerous asides with which Roth interrupts the story to converse with his computer, Ecclesias, about such matters as his feelings and emotions, his evaluation of writing and writers, the tragic block that kept him from writing for so long and his debt of gratitude to his wife, who died in 1940, for her unfailing encouragement.

Some readers will find these interpolations jarring. But others will discover in them the innermost and honest concerns of a writer who is so crippled with arthritis that he has to be lifted into a sitting position every morning in order to write.

Mercy of a Rude Stream (the unusual title is taken from Shakespeare, "Weary and old with service, to the mercy of a rude stream that must for ever hide me") is not the groundbreaking book that its predecessor was. Nonetheless, it is a signal achievement. The reader looks forward to the other promised books that will undoubtedly further advance the career of a still youthful, but maturing protagonist.

Greenwin

Al Green

Developer Al Green considers himself "Toronto's most successful school dropout." At 15, he was pulled out of high school because his father needed his help as a bricklayer and in an assortment of contracting jobs. At 18, duty called. Green joined the Canadian army and was sent overseas. After his stint abroad, he returned to a country that was on the verge of an economic boom. He rejoined the family business and they broadened their line to include carpentry and general contract work. The business progressed well and eventually Green teemed up with Arthur Winestock to form Greenwin Construction Company Ltd., an important player in development and construction of residential housing. In addition to his business ventures, Green took an active role in building the school at Temple Sinai, the Baycrest Terrace and, with his brother Harold, the Lipa Green Building, named after their father. Today, he devotes half of every day to his passion, sculpting. He has donated many of his works to the Lubavitcher movement and to the United Jewish Appeal. He spoke recently with The CJN's Paul Lungen.

CJN: How did you go from a small business to a large development company?

Green: After the war we were contractors and I was making a nice living. It was a small family business that we started from nothing. I was building a few houses here and there and we started to build factories. There was a big demand right after the war in 1945-46 for factory space, as people wanted to get back into civilian merchandizing.

So we began to build factories at Adelaide and Spadina, in the needle trade area. We would put up a little two-storey factory, about 10,000 to 20,000 square feet, sell it off, put up another one, sell it off and things were going along fine.

Then I met Arthur Weinstock, who was in the needle trade and I was building a building for him. He said, there's not much money in the needle trade these days, why don't we build some houses?

So we formed a partnership called Greenwin Construction Company Ltd. — Green for me and we shortened Weinstock to "Win" — and it became Greenwin. We bought eight lots on Brooke Avenue. He put up $20,000 and I put up $5,000, which I didn't have, but we borrowed here and there. As a matter of fact, I had to sell my car, my prized possession, to raise the money.

We sold the houses for $10,400 each, ready to move in, including the land. I made a few thousand dollars and was doing fine. I had more money than I'd seen before in my life.

So I went across the road where Baycrest [Geriatric Centre] is today and I bought 13 lots there and sold them for $13,500.

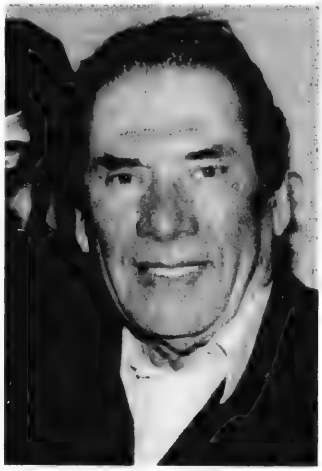
Then we bought 30 lots at Wilson and Bathurst, and every year we put up 20 to 25 houses. Simultaneously, I continued with general contracting. A big change came when Don Mills opened up and we got to know the E.P. Taylor group. They owned 3,000 acres from Post Road to Victoria Park Avenue. We were the first builders in Don Mills and built 125 houses in one year in around 1960.

We kept increasing year after year, and then we decided to get into the apartment business and we built a few small four-storey buildings. Then we got to know some people down at City Hall and around 1965 we started to assemble land around the Davisville and Yonge area where we put together 360 houses on both sides of Balliol and on Davisville, and we rezoned the whole thing for high rises and townhouses. It was a big project. We did the same thing around Yonge and Eglinton.

Then we developed the Yonge-Eglinton centre on the northwest corner with about 800,000 sq. ft. of office space and a couple of hundred thousand square feet of retail and 800 apartments.

We still manage it today.

Around 1980, we restructured the company. We were getting into a new generation. Al Latner and my brother Harold joined the company and the older ones, Winestock and my father, retired.



We had a very active company, everyone was getting along well and [years later] we decided to restructure the company [again] because the next generation was coming along and they wanted to do their own thing. So Harold, Latner and I went our own way. We still retain a management company and we're still partners in Greenwin Management and we manage today about 15,000 suites. It's a successful and active company.

But everybody does their own construction. Al and Harold have their own companies. I don't build. I've never really been involved in construction. I've worked with Harold and Al around the actual construction. My job was mostly planning and developing.

CJN: You got into business after the war when construction was booming. How would you feel if you had to go into business now?

Green: I wouldn't want to. Things were definitely a lot simpler in those days. If you wanted to re-zone land then, the whole bylaw might be two pages. Today, if you want to re-zone something, you've got to file 28 copies of an application to develop land. You've got to go through environmental studies, sun shadow studies, landscaping plans, all before you even know where you're going. After you've gone through all the red tape, you don't even know if the market's there.

[Meanwhile], you've got to carry the land. We're not like public corporations with millions and millions of dollars. We have a limited line of credit and limited capital to work with.

We were partners with several people who had some money to work with. [On one occasion], we did a big development [with a partner] on all the land between Bathurst and Yonge on the south side of Steeles. There was 6,500 feet of frontage on the south side of Steeles and we built in one year about 450 houses. We also built all those apartments at Bathurst and Steeles and then we sold off a lot of land.

When you talk about houses, in those days it was a totally different situation [than today]. A house in that area had a selling price of $18,500 and you only needed a couple of thousand to buy a house.

Today, to build a house you're talking about $200,000 to $300,000. For a 10-house project, you're talking about a couple of million dollars. It's true the dollar isn't the same as it was then, but because of the difference in the selling prices, it was much easier to do the quantity we did then.

CJN: Does that mean the development business is only for the bigger companies.?

Green: It's very difficult for smaller people to develop anything today. The big corporations can afford to take chances, they can write off the losses against other operations and they can afford to sit if the going gets tough. But you can fall big too.

CJN: How has your thinking changed in the last few years in terms of starting new projects?

Green: It's almost impossible to assemble land or houses any more for redevelopment of any consequence. If it's zoned, people hang on to the houses for a big dollar. At the same time, by the time you get through paying today's prices for a house, it's worth more as a house than it is for the land. We used to look for bad houses with big back yards so the house price was cheap and the land was there to redevelop. You couldn't do it today. Today new developments are mostly in suburban areas (like Mississaugua and Whitby). You don't see much redevelopment in the residential field today.

CJN: Does the amount of red tape depend on which government is in power?

Green: I haven't seen any difference, although an NDP government will lean more towards socialized housing. When they came in, we had to incorporate a portion of the units in new developments for low cost housing. The bureaucracy with the province and the city hasn't changed with any government.

CJN: What factors do you consider when you plan a development?

Green: Some areas are better than others. The West End is more affluent. Markham is more affluent than Scarborough. But generally you go by the immediate environment in that location. If you've got a site in Mississauga, you'll get people from all over, it doesn't matter where they're from.

CJN: What are the hot areas for residential development in Toronto now?

Green: That's tough. Mississauga right now is probably the most desirable location, because of its open space. The West End has always been more attractive. The East End has traditionally been less attractive, but now they're expanding in every direction, to Barrie and outlying areas. It's cheap.

CJN: What are people demanding today in a home that they didn't 20 years ago?

Green: Most of what we do is highrise buildings. We haven't built a rental building for a long time because the numbers just don't add up. So everything we build are condos. You have to provide more amenities in the buildings themselves to make them saleable. Although way back when, at Davisville and Yonge, we had seven indoor swimming pools in the buildings, a tennis club, which we're now enclosing, a fitness club. Basically the amenities are the same though they're more elaborate today.

CJN: What about the size of the suites themselves? Do people want them bigger?

Green: No, smaller. They don't want smaller, but they can't afford bigger [ones]. The whole name of the game is to try to keep the price down. If you're talking about the general market, all the apartments downtown are only 700 to 800 square feet; that's all they are for young couples. They're one-bedrooms, bachelors.

Families tend to go to the suburbs. We just finished two big buildings at Don Mills and York Mills and they're about 1,200 square feet because they're a mix of one- and two-bedroom suites.

CJN: What's the main deterrent for building rental apartments today?

Green: If you consider the costs of construction, and even if you get a mortgage at a super rate of interest, the rent you could get if you rented it out could not begin to come close to the cost of carrying that building. What people don't understand is that about 55 percent of income goes for taxes and maintenance. Rents don't begin to cover the other costs. The market won't support it. I know of very few [rental] buildings going up.

CJN: Where's the housing market going now?

Green: The market is slowly coming back. Right now, we've got a glut of condominiums. There's a lot of talk about converting office space into condominiums, although I haven't seen it happen yet.

You won't see new commercial buildings for a long time. The land [that had been valued for commercial purposes] is being revalued down and can only be used for residential [purposes] now. That will bring the price down so they can afford to put condominiums there when the demand comes back.

A $100 million civil suit is filed against L'Oreal

Jewish Telegraph Agency

NEW YORK — A $100 million civil action suit has been filed by two French brothers against L'Oreal, alleging that the world's largest cosmetics manufacturer bribed Syrian authorities to get off the blacklist of companies that comply with the Arab boycott of Israel.

The suit, filed Feb. 2 in New York State Supreme Court by Jean and David Frydman, also charges fraud, saying the firm forged papers to remove Jean Frydman from L'Oreal's board because he was a resident of Israel.

The suit was filed in New York because, the brothers say, New York State and U.S. anti-boycott laws were violated by L'Oreal's American licensee, Cosmair.

The Frydmans also filed a complaint some months ago against L'Oreal with the U.S. Office of Boycott Compliance in Washington.

The New York suit is the latest in a convoluted saga that travels from Paris to Israel and the United States.

Besides alleging fraud and other improprieties, the complaint refers at length to L'Oreal's founders and executives and their alleged ties to World War II Nazi collaborators.

Cosmair issued a statement this month saying the complaint "clearly misstates" the U.S. firm's activities.

The firm said, "Cosmair, Inc. is a U.S. company operating exclusively on the American market" and "has no business interest in the Middle East."

Moreover, it said, "Cosmair has a long-standing policy forbidding discrimination on any grounds including race, creed and nationality."

And it denied ties to a deceased chief executive of L'Oreal who served prison time for war crimes.

Will Maslow, editor of the Boycott Report published by the American Jewish Congress and who has advised the Frydman family, said, "We're delighted that the suit has been brought and we hope that the American courts will provide the Frydman brothers with the justice that the French courts were unable to give them."

Jean Frydman, who lives in Israel and also retains French citizenship, was a board member in France of L'Oreal and a longtime friend of L'Oreal Chairman Francois Dalle.

In 1990, the two entered into a separate business agreement to set up a film company called Paravision. Some of the funds for establishing the company were to be provided by L'Oreal.

But a French lawyer who has perused documents on L'Oreal claimed that money changed hands to remove the company from the blacklist and gave written substantiation of a list of charges the Frydmans have made against the company.

Parts of a secret report prepared by the lawyer, David Ruzie, were leaked last month to the French and Israeli media.

The Frydman brothers and Ruzie charge that L'Oreal made bribery payments to remove the firm from the blacklist.

The case in France went into arbitration but remained inconclusive.

Israel is pressing for a public apology from the company, the London Jewish Chronicle has reported.

The London paper also reported that L'Oreal is now considering a possible investment in Israel.

Among the allegations that Ruzie made is a charge that in 1981, an executive at Chimex, a subsidiary of L'Oreal, sent written proof to the Damascus boycott office that the firm "had no interests whatsoever in Israel."

According to Ruzie's report, in 1984, L'Oreal's holding company completed a questionnaire for the Kuwaiti Arab boycott office showing the firm did not sell to Israel.

Ruzie wrote, "Starting in 1985, numerous letters were exchanged between L'Oreal and various representatives of Arab states" about L'Oreal's purchase of cosmetics manufacturer Helena Rubinstein.

One of the sensational aspects of this case is that L'Oreal, in its earliest days following World War II, employed or had ties to people who were officials of the Vichy regime, which persecuted Jews.

In the meantime, L'Oreal is refraining from commenting on the case.

Pension crisis affects baby boomers

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Baby boomers will be socking away money for their golden years, said a top economist at a recent seminar.

Dr. Sherry Cooper, vice-chair and chief economist at Burns Fry Limited told an audience that "baby boomers will be amassing wealth to prepare for their retirement" because they may not be able to collect government pensions. As a consequence, she foresees "a dramatic surge in investment funds such as Canada Equity and Bond Funds, as well as Foreign Equity Funds."

Cooper was the main speaker at a recent seminar organized by State of Israel Bonds, which is in the midst of its first RRSP campaign. The purpose of the seminar was to promote the RRSP eligibility of Israel Bonds. A recent amendment in legislation permits Israeli bonds to be included in the 20 per cent foreign content of self directed RRSP portfolios.

Those people who attended the seminar, which was advertised as The Looming Pension Crisis, were out of luck if they came to hear an in-depth discussion of the pension crisis. Cooper was the only speaker to mention it and she spoke about it very briefly.

Instead she gave a broad economic forecast which touched on many subjects. She predicted a decline in the inflation and long-term interest rates, and a 3 to 4 per cent growth in the Canadian economy. She said Canadian currency would be volatile as a result of political uncertainty in Quebec. Cooper foresees the stock market out-performing the bond market, and a modest growth in real estate.

She said the unemployment rate in the G-7 countries will continue to be high because of the ongoing elimination of jobs by the technological revolution, the increased supply of cheap labor outside of these countries and the continual reduction of staff by companies trying to stay competitive. Cooper said unemployment will cause tax short-falls which will lead to further deficit spending by government.

She classified the G-7 countries as mature economies and said the best investment opportunities would be outside of these countries. She foresees the highest growth in Asia, particularly China "which has the third largest and fastest growing economy in the world."

Cooper was optimistic about overall growth of the economy. She said there has been a resurgence of spending in the United States — construction has picked up in the areas hit by natural disasters, and there has been a resurgence in automobile manufacturing because people are replacing old vehicles. Once Canadians begin spending, Cooper expects Ontario to prosper, because there will be a great demand for the cars manufactured in the province.

Richard Venn, chair and CEO of Wood Gundy was the other speaker at the seminar. He made a brief speech endorsing the investment benefits of Israel bonds. He said the peace initiative had improved Israel's credit rating. He also recommended the purchase of foreign bonds as a way of diversifying investment portfolios.

The organizers of the seminar were disappointed by the turnout. Warnings of a severe winter storm had deterred many people from attending. "There were 60 people but we were expecting 150 to show up," said Marsha Cohen, manager of the Israel Bonds RRSP department.

Some people who had braved the bad weather were also disappointed. "I thought I would find out about the looming pension crisis. That was the title," said Steven Heller. "I didn't find out anything new."

But, Eric Daniel Brody was pleased he came. "I came down to find out about mutual funds and the economy. I thought she (Cooper) was informative. She put it together well. It was definitely worthwhile," she said.

Charlene Rochman also found the seminar informative. "I'm interested in opening up a self-directed RRSP. I don't have Israel Bonds, but I wanted to find out about both," she said.

Stock market woes

By DAVID LANDAU
Special to The CJN

JERUSALEM — The recent ups and downs of the Israeli stock exchange have given investors the jitters, just when Israel is trying to lure investors with the promise of peace in the region.

Losses at the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange averaged 5 per cent, but later the market posted across-the-board gains of a similar percentage amount, thereby adding confusion — and hope — to the near-panic that had set in progressively during the month.

During February as a whole, market losses eroded some $12 billion from the value of Israeli shares, which dropped from a total value of approximately $55 billion to $43 billion.

While the general investment mood improved, pundits warned that the gains could be purely technical.

Most seemed to feel that the boom months would not return soon and that the investing public would, at best, have to get used to a slower upward climb.

From July 1993 to the year's end, the Israeli stock market rose some 40 percent, and prices held firm through the first month of this year.

The massive February falls were variously attributed to statements by market insiders that shares were overvalued, and also to the government's recent stolid refusal to intervene in the market.

Also cited as a cause of the recent market plunge were recent investigations launched by the stock exchange itself and by the police into allegations of stock-price manipulations by mutual fund portfolio managers and traders.

The convictions earlier this month of many of the country's leading bankers for artificially inflating the prices of their banks' shares during the early 1980s are not thought to be directly linked to the recent fluctuations of the market.

The bankers are currently awaiting sentencing. Their activities eventually forced the Israeli government to buy out the crumbling banks in 1983, during Israel's worst financial scandal.

With interest rates around the world almost uniformly low, and with peace apparently just over the horizon in the Middle East, Israel has rapidly attained a place for itself among the lists of "emerging markets" in major American and European financial publications.

Both the volume of trading at the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange, and the underlying boom atmosphere that is felt throughout the Israeli economy, have persuaded these publications to take note of the Tel Aviv exchange.

Israeli officials and private entrepreneurs believe this trend reflects a similar awakening of awareness among private investors and business executives around the world.

Experts in Tel Aviv say the stock market's February plunge need not adversely affect this basic optimism. On the contrary, they maintain, market volatility coupled with stringent efforts to uncover stock-price manipulation are two important hallmarks of serious "emerging markets."

Far from deterring outside investors, they say, these two phenomena ought to reassure them that the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange is proceeding on the right course.

OVER THE COUNTER GOLD

This picture shows gold ingots for sale at the Mercantile Discount Bank in Tel Aviv. The bank became the first in Israel to sell gold bullion to its customers over the counter. Ingots of 10, 20, 50 and 100 grams went on sale at the branch in Tel Aviv as a promotion to attract clients.

BUSINESS BRIEFS

Investors, Be Prepared

TORONTO — With so much financial excitement surrounding Israel, experts are advising prospective investors to do their homework first.

According to Ben Noy, the consul for economic affairs in Toronto at Israel's Economic Mission, it's important to pinpoint a preferred industry as an investment target.

"If a person is not specific, it makes it very difficult for us to help," he says.

Other tips to keep in mind:

•trading on the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange requires an Israeli broker;

•the most generous Israeli government grants and tax incentives are available for investments in the country's top priority development zones (check with the Mission for exact locations);

•a computer disk is available from Israel's Ministry of Industry & Trade listing Israeli companies seeking international co-operative arrangements.

Capital City, Capital Prices

JERUSALEM — Here's a sign of the economic times in Jerusalem. The Israel Lands Authority is asking $1,000 (US) a square meter for residential development property near the Israel Museum.

Although that is a record request, land values are expected to go even higher.

However, developers are undeterred by these stratospheric costs as bidding is brisk.

The price tag for each of the 97 homes to be built could hit $700,000 or more.

* * *

Exchange Hopping

BERLIN — A major German brokerage house, MWB, would like to list shares of several Israel companies on the Berlin Stock Exchange.

MWB is proposing an unconventional method of offering shares. The broker will list them for trade, working in co-operation with an American brokerage firm.

All of the Israeli companies selected by MWB trade on U.S. exchanges.

A System Fit For Kings

Morocco's King Hassan chose Amiad Filtration Systems for his farm near Marrakesh. The company specializes in orchard irrigation and would like to extend its expertise across Morocco.

The King's contract is worth about $200,000.

A Bar Mitzvah Ranking

ISRAEL — Israel received a bar mitzvah ranking in a quality of life survey which included 22 countries.

The survey was conducted by the Economist, Britain's weekly news magazine.

The poll, in which Israel placed 13th, one ahead of Canada, looked at economics, health and welfare, cultural life, public sector employment, military expenditures, civil rights and women's rights.

Switzerland placed first, Germany second and Spain third.

* * *

One Major Investor

GERMANY — Ignatz Bubis is best known as the often outspoken leader of Germany's small Jewish population. Less publicized are his Israeli hotel acquistions.

Bubis owns the Dan Panorama in Tel Aviv, 40 per cent of the Tel Aviv Sheraton and Eilat's Club Med, in addition to properties all over Germany.

After the war, which he survived by fleeing to Russia, Bubis returned to his homeland, eventually becoming chair of the Jewish community of Germany.

Tourism Is A Money Maker

ISRAEL — Israel's tourist market is so hot there's a new mutual fund available just for the tourism industry.

It's called Lahak Tourism and it is part of Bank Hapoalim's mutual fund group.

A record two million tourists landed in Israel last year, with even larger numbers expected this year if the Israel-PLO peace accord proceeds as scheduled. These figures prompted the creation of Lahak Tourism.

* * *

Now You Can Leave Home

TEL AVIV — Israel's Bank Hapoalim and Bank Stolichni, one of Russia's leading banks, are finalizing a deal to enable the two banks to recognize each other's credit cards.

After the arrangement goes into effect, holders of Russian credit cards will be able to obtain shekels from Bank Hapoalim automatic teller machines, and holders of Israeli credit cards will similarly be able to obtain rubles through Bank Stolichni.

The agreement is intended for the convenience of the thousands of tourists and businessmen who visit Israel and Russia each year.

These briefs were compiled with information supplied by Israel's Economic Mission (416) 961-1242.

Collection reflects nature and global influences

By ELAINE COHEN
Special to The CJN

As the signature implies, Mondi stands for international fashion — and the four corners of the globe figure prominently in the 1994 Spring/Summer collections.

Among the 21 groupings are L'Afrique, Le Blanc et Bleu, Le Vert, La Terre, La Dune, Le Bordeaux, and La Nuit. Batik, paisley and jungle prints reflect the multi-cultural influence of Asia, Africa and South America. Even some of the jackets hint at the Orient with Mandarin collars.

The back to nature mood is reflected in colors and fabrics — the two directions in fabrics including microfibres that drape and cool linen blends.

La Terre collection features 100 per cent linen. L'Afrique features bold jungle prints and solid shades in olive and turquoise silk. Modern classics meet traditional basics in Le Blanc et Bleu. Fashioned on clean-cut lines, the marine inspiration favors crisp white and navy. Cross-stitch embroidery adds a playful touch to tops in cotton and crepe.

Whether it's a romp in the meadow or tea on the terrace, romantic floral prints mix with moss green in the striking Le Vert collection. La Dune introduces a high-fashion fabric that makes for soft dressing. Equally easy on the eyes is sand dune coupled with cream.

Le Bordeaux, a Marlene Dietrich inspiration, highlights huge floral prints in wine and cream or navy and cream. Chiffon scarves, bordeaux shoulder bags, two-tone belts and large picture hats complete the scene. Mondi focuses on elegant black evening attire in La Nuit. Black mesh belts, handbags and sandals add savvy to these party-pleasers.

"Items are interactive and can be mixed and matched," says Jennifer Elliott, director of retail stores. "Styles range from sporty and casual to romantic evening wear. Skirt lengths are both long and short." This laissez-faire attitude frees the consumer to complement her figure and dress according to her mood. Pant styling options range from narrow pleated to full flowing.

The sarong is another Mondi innovation. Mondi designers created a secure wrap. "Elasticized at the back, it stays intact," relates Elliott, illustrating how the garment is secured to the knee. The layered "onion" look is big. Long blouses are shown under shorter vests or sweaters. Similarly, blouses can be worn over the bottoms or tucked in.

Mondi apparel, sizes 34-44, is available at Ogilvy and Holt Renfrew (Pointe Claire and Rockland) in Montreal, and in Toronto at Hazelton Lanes, Eaton Centre, Bayview Village, Holt Renfrew (Yorkdale, Sherway Gardens), as well as in most Holt Renfrew stores across Canada.

Color co-ordinated accessories in luxurious leathers and fine fabrics come with every collection. Besides belts, shoes, purses and hats, Mondi has launched a full fragrance line. All Mondi boutiques carry Pursence perfume, body lotion, body cream, shower gel and soap.

Portara, another upscale choice under the Mondi banner, is available in sizes 34-44 at Mondi collection stores in Hazelton Lanes (Toronto), and Ogilvy (Montreal). Designed by a different team, Portara offers eight fashion-forward collections.

"One of the most exciting trends is Portara's new knitwear," Elliott explains. "A loose weave, it is finely spun. The cut is unstructured, yet elegant. The look is sheer and long." A batik blue and white linen-silk collection accents Nehru jackets and cropped pants. A cocoa and white collection is styled in washed silk prints. Tank tops and T-shirts are embellished with beading.

Among other sophisticated collections are Portara's neutral color groupings in cappuccino and natural, beige and cream. In addition, there are some suede pieces. Details like cut-out lacing add interest to the luxurious apparel.

Sunny Choi: classic styling and elegance

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

Feminine, elegant and subtle sophistication is the hallmark of the Sunny Choi collection for spring and summer.

Noted for classic styling, emphasis on detail and total femininity, the collection was created with soft, fluid lines that move with a woman's body.

Choi, who graduated from the Seoul National University with a degree in fine arts, and then continued her studies at the Ontario College of Art, began her career in fashion, designing costumes for the National Ballet of Canada and exclusive couture pieces for the Yorkville retailer, Fidani.

She says she designs for women very much like herself "confident, cosmopolitan and feminine. All my life I have dedicated myself to creating a particular image on canvas. These are the women with timeless beauty and glamor. With these visions in mind, I continue to design my clothes."

Her chosen colors this year are primarily subtle neutrals, and her separates, from fun daywear to sophisticated career wear to elegant evening suits all mix easily to create unique styling. Pieces are refined, but with a twist, and they lack no attention to detail.

Cotton dresses, skirts and tops in black, white and awning stripes are trimmed with a whisper of delicate guipure lace and are perfect for feminine cool summer dressing. The Zen selection, consisting of loose narrow-fitted pants and wrap jackets in a cool dessert sand, is linen-viscose and trimmed with mandarin collars and ceramic buttons to contribute to the oriental influence.

For those evenings out, navy, coffee bean print silk georgette is coupled with bone cotton lace of roses, allowing the separates to become whimsically romantic. Satin-back crepe evening suits complimented with silk chiffon in buttercup, ice blue, sand, navy, creme, black and white, create sleek sophistication. Interlude, a selection of draping silhouettes of 100 per cent crinkle silk from the Orient, creates flirtatious freedom with its fluid movement.

Sunny Choi Fashions are available at Sunny Choi Fashion Houses across Canada and from American retailers such as Bergdorf Goodman, Nordstroms and I. Magnum. The fashion house concept focuses exclusively on personal, customized service by appointment and stresses versatility, superior quality and good value.

Distinctive Styling

Ecology theme is popular

By RACHEL ALKALLAY
Special to The CJN

Dénommé Vincent. The name sounds as if it were created specifically for a designer, but Marcel Dénommé and Louise Vincent, partners since 1980, have put together their monikers to the benefit of Quebec design.

Together, the two graduates of College Marie-Victorin have gained a reputation for designing men's clothing of casual, affordable elegance.

Their combination atelier/retail store, located in a spacious second floor walk-up on Berri Street, has been supplying fashion-conscious men from Montreal to Vancouver with distinctive style since 1982.

The theme of the spring 1994 collection is simplicity and ecology. The result is a mix-and-match, totally modern look emphasizing natural colors and fabrics.

The servicability of 100 per cent wool, a mark of Dénommé Vincent, is put to use in two distinctive silhouettes.

Unpadded shoulders, roomy and unstructured jackets mix with a stand-up collar which doesn't require a tie. There are fewer details, with the emphasis on excellent cut and pure lines.

The second look, more structured, nevertheless emphasizes supple construction and easy wearability. Co-ordinates are important: wearability from season to season, combined with comfort in wearing, is what the '90s man wants.

The vest has re-emerged as an important fashion statement after years of blending into the background. Vests are bright and bold, striped, polka-dotted — "avant-garde," says Vincent. They can be cut traditionally in a V-neck, or rounded to the neck. Textures are light or heavy, made from shirt fabric to match, or from wool for a more formal look.

Fabrics accentuate natural fibers, "noble material," says Vincent. Linen, cotton, and blends of linen/cotton and viscose/linen continue the ecology theme. Wool remains very important. The wide range of wools, particularly elegant tropical wools which can be worn through the seasons, is vital to the collection.

Natural shades dominate the palette. Navy blue and charcoal are big in the collection, offset by natural colors like cream, off-white and eggshell.

Checks and plaids in the sports jackets are highlighted with touches of khaki or spicy paprika red.

A mark of Dénommé Vincent is their uncuffed pants. "Uncuffed pants are more convenient to the customer," says Vincent. "The client can create his own length, his own style." Crisp and clean flat-front pants are spring and summer's favorite styles. Higher waists are also in evidence.

Double-breasted jackets with three or four buttons set apart the Dénommé Vincent client, who averages from 30 to 45 years old.

Dénommé Vincent uses only imported European fabrics, most of which come from Italy. The clothing is made almost entirely in Quebec, with certain items made for the designers in the Czech Republic.

"Friday has become the weekend at work," declares Vincent, and as a result, men are dressing more casually and comfortably on that day. Toss out the ties and the suits: Friday dressing has switched to vests and sports jackets, as lifestyles change to the new rhythm of the economy.

Invest in a professional facial

By CAROL WISE
Special to The CJN

This has definitely been the longest coldest winter I can remember. The thought of spring truly warms my heart. Good-bye to those cold blistering days. HELLO sunshine. Flowers blooming and trees budding are all sure signs that spring is here.

"What's new?" is the question that I am asked repeatedly at this time of the year. Your palette will be filled with a multitude of soft warm colors and application will be delicate and subtle.

Taking care of your skin is probably the most important thing you can do at this time of the year. After the long cold, dry winter, you have likely accumulated many dead cells that are sitting on the surface of your skin. This not only detracts from your skin color, but makes your skin appear dry and dehydrated and at worst will cause you unsightly crinkles. It is imperative that you exfoliate with a facial scrub or perhaps invest in a professional facial.

Spring is a wonderful time for your skin. The air becomes moist with humidity, your heating system is shut down and you will naturally have an added glow to your skin. However, be sure to lighten up your moisturizing regime. Rich creams used through the winter months are no longer necessary; they may cause you unwanted blemishes. Your spring moisturizer should be light and airy in texture.

The sun's rays are everywhere, and the problem with the ozone layer is definitely not improving, so be sure to wear sun block on a daily basis.

When you are choosing your makeup-look for the spring, keep it delicate and subtle. Choose a foundation that matches your natural skin shade and apply it sparingly, just enough to even out your tones.

Apply your blush-on with a soft large brush high on your cheekbones. A fabulous look this spring will be a combination of the colors rose and brown. Do blend well, you don't want that striped look.

Most popular eye shadow colors will be mocha, ivory and chocolate. Ivory under your brow, mocha on your lid and chocolate in the crease of your eyelid. Your brows should be full and well shaped. Pencil them to give them added definition.

Lips are still your focal point. Outline with lots of lip pencil and choose a color that best suits your skin tone. Most popular shades will be earthy beige and brown, and of course, burgundy. However, these colors are not for everyone, so be careful choosing, it is better to look good than wear the most fashionable color that doesn't suit you.

Have a great spring and smile, summer is on its way.

The business of mail ordering

This outfit appears in the Big, Bold and Beautiful catalogue.

By AMY SATTIN
Special to The CJN

Who among us wouldn't welcome the opportunity to shop from home? Instead of jostling for a parking spot, fighting the crowds and standing in line at the cash register, you could put up your feet, flip through a catalogue and place your order by phone.

Canadians are being bitten by the catalogue bug. Catalogue shopping accounted for almost $2 billion in sales in 1991, according to a study done for the Canadian Direct Marketing Association (CDMA). While only 50 catalogue companies pay membership dues, the CDMA estimates there are an additional 575 such companies in the country.

Specialty clothing catalogues like Mercury Clothing Company for children, Big, Bold and Beautiful for plus-size women, and Disney merchandise for kids of all ages are relatively new to the catalogue scene, combining unique merchandise with the comforts of home shopping.

Toronto store Big, Bold and Beautiful has produced catalogues for each of the past four seasons. Designed by owner Jackqueline Hope, the fashions in sizes 14 to 28 include lingerie, comfortable casuals, figure-flattering separates and evening wear.

Home shoppers can choose from a wild Wild West outfit consisting of an oversized fringed and rhinestoned rayon blouse in black ($179) paired with gold-studded stirrup pants in a cotton/lycra blend ($69), or substitute an oversized animal-spring shirt ($179) for a different look. Foundation teddies in white or black cotton/lycra blends come with underwire cups, removable shoulder pads and snap bottoms for $79. Equally comfortable are v-neck sweat tops in three colors (red, black and purple) for $72, which can be paired with black leggings for $69.

Items from the Big, Bold and Beautiful catalogue can be ordered by phone, mail or fax. Canadian and U.S. customers can call toll-free 1-800-668-4673, or (416) 923-4673 in Toronto between 10 a.m. and 6 p.m., Monday to Saturday. Merchandise is delivered between four and six weeks after receipt of payment. Delivery charges range from $4 to $16, depending on the size of the order, and refunds on items only can be made within five days. The spring catalogue will be available sometime in March.

The Walt Disney Co. found a Canadian catalogue partner in Regal Greetings and Gifts. Since the fall of 1992, quarterly catalogues — spring, summer, fall and holiday — have let Canadian shoppers buy American-made fashions and gifts without the bother of exchange rates and duties.

The response has been phenomenal, says Sheridan Antoniuk, Regal's director of new business development. She reports 55,000 purchases in the 17-month period leading up to Dec. 31, 1993, with clothing sales counting for more than 50 per cent of the total. The average catalogue order is $60.

The spring 1994 catalogue spotlight is on Winnie-the-Pooh; previous catalogues have featured 101 Dalmatians, Snow White and Aladdin. Many of the items available through the 32-page Glossy catalogue can also be found at Disney stores throughout the country, but the catalogue has many exclusives. Among the biggest sellers are 100 per cent cotton boxer shorts printed with Pooh, Piglet, Tigger and Eeyore, which sell for $20. "They're doing well for Father's Day," says Antoniuk.

Another Disney catalogue exclusive is a slimming exercise suit for women. The two-piece outfit includes black biking shorts with a grey racing stripe and matching tank suit with Mickey Mouse silkscreened on the chest. The shorts sell for $30 and the top for $32. Both are made from a polyester/cotton/lycra blend and are available in small, medium and large sizes.

Just in time for April showers are Minnie Mouse raincoats for girls sizes 4 to 10. Made of white vinyl and patterned with pink hearts and Minnie Mouse faces, the raincoats come with drawstring hoods, two pockets and snap closures and sell for $15. "We can't keep them in stock," says Antoniuk. The matching umbrella can be ordered for $12.

Also popular this season are 101 Dalmatians baseball caps for children ages 2 to 6. The red caps ($15) have a puff-printed character above the visor and black paw prints scattered all over. "They're a great seller for us in spring," says Antoniuk.

Merchandise can be ordered by calling toll-free 1-800-668-3437 or (416) 425-2072 between 8 a.m. and 8 p.m. Orders are sent via Canada Post within 24 hours, and come with a no-risk return policy. Delivery charges are approximately 10 per cent of orders.

The Walt Disney Co. is smart to join forces with a Canadian cataloguer, says James Church of the CDMA. "Transplanted catalogues [from the United States] don't work. You have to take a look at the market as a distinct entity and be sensitive to the differences." He cites the example of an American cataloguer trying to sell an Abraham Lincoln daytimer in Canada.

Canadian cataloguers, however, can learn from their American counterparts. Mercury Clothing Company co-owners Nicole Swadron and Jodi Unger did extensive research of the American market before launching their first children's catalogue last fall.

The 12-page catalogue features active wear for infants and toddlers of both sexes, in sizes 6 months to 6x. Jeans and overalls are by Osh Kosh B'Gosh. Overalls in sizes 2 to 6x sell for $36 (infants $33), with snap-legged infant jeans and kid's jeans with zippered fly both for $30.

For infants, Mercury Clothing offers 100 per cent pre-shrunk cotton fleece jumpsuits in bubblegum, spearmint and denim colors for $28. A cotton flannel jumpsuit in a red plaid print sells for $30. Turtlenecks in red, white and black have domed closures at the neck and retail for $16. All infant clothing is available in sizes 6 to 24 months.

Older children have their choice of cotton fleece sweatshirts in navy and red for $23, or with hoods in dark green, bubblegum, spearmint and denim for $30 (red hood $35). For girls, there are striped tops ($28) and matching leggings ($26) in black and grey, or red and blue combinations.

Orders can be placed by calling collect (416) 595-5999 between 10 a.m. and 11 p.m., Monday to Friday, or by faxing (416) 598-3685. Merchandise is sent out within three business days. Shipping and handling is extra, but Mercury Clothing Company offers free pick-up on return or exchange items.

A total eclipse in activewear

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

Rising awareness of the dangers of prolonged exposure to the sun's rays has caused consumer demand for UV protective devices to increase dramatically in the past several years.

The most common device, however — chemical sunscreen lotion — has its limitations. The effectiveness of these lotions depend on such factors as swimming and perspiration and even if re-applied regularly, there is no safe way of determining when the effectiveness begins to wear off.

Fortunately, Total Eclipse Activewear has created an alternative to these messy lotions. A one-piece body suit for children made of quality, lightweight microspan keeps them covered from wrists to ankles and provides protection both in and out of the water. Tests performed at the University of Toronto's Laser Lightwave Research Centre confirm that Total Eclipse Activewear provides the equivalent protection of a sunscreen lotion with an SPF of 30 to 40 when the lotion has been adequately applied and maintained.

Designed by owners Janet and John Koleszar, who wanted to find a way to protect without sunscreen, the garments are not only perfect for playing in and out of the water, they are great for dance and gymnastics. "These one-piece outfits dry quickly, are flexible and tough and are so lightweight there are no heat concerns at all. Children will not get too warm, even on hot, sticky days," says Janet Koleszar.

Durability and practicality do not detract from the bright, cheerful designs. A feminine purple suit with rainbows, or a pink suit with stars and hearts, a unisex blue suit trimmed with a bit of fucshia and covered in thunderbolts or a masculine suit in black, forest green and red are sure to please even the fussiest kids. Sizes are available from infant to size seven and all are equipped with a full frontal zipper that allows young children easy dressing.

Garments provide the equivalent protection of a sunscreen lotion with an SPF of 30 to 40. The colorful pieces are perfect in and out of the water. Great for dance and gym.

Ties: the businessman's form of communication

By DEBBIE HELLER
Special to The CJN

Real estate entrepreneur Gary Silverberg had to be coaxed into exhibiting his reactionary art work at a restaurant a couple of years ago.

What started out as a hobby for Silverberg — expressing his feelings about the business world and the tough challenges people are faced with every day — has snowballed into a second career.

"In the beginning, I wasn't really aware of just how different my art was in comparison to other artists until people in the communications industry made me realize that I was the first person who had attempted to paint the sub-cultures of the business world," he said.

After his second successful exhibit titled Ties, Trophies, Tombstones, Ties, Silverberg was approached by a number of licensees from both Canada and the United States to have his art reproduced on various articles of clothing.

Although he was flattered by the offers, Silverberg chose to have his work reproduced by Oscardo, a Canadian manufacturer and distributor. He said Oscardo respected his views about creating a limited edition.

Since ties are a recurring symbol in his art, Silverberg decided it would be the perfect garment on which to print his messages. "The flag or banner of the business world is the tie."

Silverberg said he noticed ties had become a form of communication amongst businessmen. "The tie is the only piece of clothing that a man was allowed to wear to express his eccentricity as well as conformity . . . and was not chastised or ostracized for it."

"It is the one garment that allows you to express your political alignment in camouflage."

His designs are serious and comical. From the global economy to vertical integration, the images from Ties, Trophies, Tombstones, Ties have been produced on the finest jaquard silk. The series includes He Who Would Be King, The Last Bureaucrat, The Screamer, Canadian American Dream?, Baby Makes Three, The Last Power Breakfast and Drinking Goes With The Territory.

Each tie is numbered and signed. It is tagged with a philosophical explanation attached to the back — "the price you pay for success or is it the price others pay for your success" is one example.

The ties cost between $60 to $65 and can be found in better men's wear stores throughout the Toronto area including Florence Lewis, Men 2000, Corby's, Andre For Men, Caruso Enrico Designs, Times For Men and Carlin Enterprises.

Baby Makes Three is the name of this tie pictured above. Silverberg explains that as milk nourishes the newborn baby, the imparting of business knowledge to ones children will assure a healthy future.

Chemical peel can improve skin

By CAROL WISE
Special to The CJN

Young, beautiful skin is everyone's dream. Although medical science has not been able to achieve this, there are many new advances that can help keep your skin looking youthful.

As the aging process begins, several quite obvious changes will occur. The most apparent change will be that your skin becomes looser and perhaps thinner in some areas. The color of your skin may become dull and your skin may take on an irregular pigmentation, in the form of so called "age spots."

Today, with modern science and technology there are many choices available that can keep your skin looking young.

Chemical peel is becoming a comparatively popular procedure in the cosmetic surgeon's office. The peel itself is an old technique that has been used mainly for the treatment of acne. The procedure involves the application of a peeling agent that, when applied to the skin, produces a burn. There are many different peeling agents and the depth of the peel can be varied according to your specific needs.

At the Centre for Cosmetic Surgery, a detailed skin analysis will be undertaken to decide which peeling and what depth of peel will be required for your individual requirements. The chemical peel removes the top layers of the skin, enabling the skin to regenerate and tighten. The treatment thus helps to remove fine lines, improve the texture and color of the skin, and eliminate broken blood vessels and age spots.

Preparation of the skin prior to the peel is crucial, says Dr. Michael Bederman, MD, FRCS, of the Centre for Cosmetic Surgery. It is basically a cleansing regime that should begin at home approximately six weeks before your peel. Retin-A is probably one of the most effective ways of preparing your skin and will certainly make your peel procedure more effective and last longer, says Bederman.

During the initial application of Retin-A, your skin may become red and sometimes blotchy and flaky; however, this will usually settle down after a few weeks. Retin-A, in addition to cleansing the skin, helps to regulate and speed up the regeneration process of the skin so that your skin becomes smoother and has better elasticity. It is essential that you be under the supervision of either a plastic surgeon or a dermatologist when you begin treatment.

Travel inspires knitwear designer

By AMY SATTIN
Special to The CJN

Like her knitting needles, Toronto knitwear designer Rachel MacHenry is straight, sharp and to the point.

"People are looking for value today," she says. "If they're going to spend their money, they're going to buy just one special thing."

MacHenry, 31, has no formal training in textiles or design. When injuries ended her career as a modern dancer, she began creating headpieces and masks for the stage before growing into knitwear. She says it was a natural progression. "I always have made things."

What MacHenry is making now are marvelous woollen knits. The 10 designs from her fall 1993 collection included two jackets styles, unisex vests plus six hats, all made from the finest Brazilian wool. Jackets range from $400 to $700, vests are $300 and hats run between $85 and $90. All can be hand washed or dry cleaned. A spring collection in cotton is not yet in production.

Her pieces are popular with members of the arts communities; she says the women range from their late teens to their 50s, and men of all ages wear her vests. She also produces shawls, blankets and throws, as well as commissioned pieces. Anything but pullovers, she says.

"Sweaters come in from the Orient for a gazillionth of what it costs to produce them here."

The pieces are inspired by her extensive travels in Asia, South America, India and Israel, where relatives of her mother live. The architecture she sees is transformed into hats, and buttons could come from antique markets in Katmandu or New Delhi.

While tracking down a matching set of wood-and-bone buttons in Nepal may be difficult for some, MacHenry says the hardest thing about producing her designs is finding skilled knitters at home.

The 15 or so who work for her include professional women who knit during daily commutes on the GO Train; stay-at-home mothers and students looking to earn extra cash; and a wheelchair-bound Hamilton man "who does the most exquisite work." She says it can take between 10 and 15 hours to knit a jacket, and six more to assemble and finish the garment.

For those looking to cross needles themselves, MacHenry has designed a number of do-it-yourself knitting kits available at the Art Gallery of Ontario. The kits, which range from $40 to $120, include patterns, yarn and instructions for a child's cardigan and pullovers for children, men and women.

MacHenry's designs for adults and children can be found exclusively at Bounty in the Queen's Quay Centre, and at Julie's in New York City. She also designs mid-priced knitwear under the Koochee label.

Custom-made Shirts

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

Whether you are in the market for a shirt, silk pajamas or boxer shorts, if you cannot find what you want in the stores, you may want to try Bauer Custom Shirts.

Company representative Elyce Kay, says that one thing that should never be compromised when purchasing shirts is a proper, comfortable fit. "Even the best ready-made shirt has one serious fault — it is a compromise. Because it is designed for the average figure, it ends up like most compromises, fitting almost no one. A custom-made shirt is designed specifically for the customer so it is always a good fit. It will not bind, sag or rub.

"Many people are tired of buying what the stores want them to buy. They know what suits them, but if it is not in style that season they will not find it. In a custom-designed shirt, whatever your choice of cut, color, cuff or collar, you get the exact look you want.

"It is these details like cuffs, collars and stitching that make the difference between a good and average shirt. A well-designed, custom-made shirt shows care and skill in every detail. Such things as single-needle stitching, perfect pleats and faultless cuffs add richness and class to a shirt."

Kay adds that the design and execution of the collar, the most noticeable feature on a shirt, is an art in itself. "It is one of the difficult features of a shirt to do well and many otherwise excellent shirts can be spoiled by an indifferent collar. Whether the choice is wing-tip or button-down, every collar should have removable stays so that it looks good for the life of the shirt."

Kay advises that when having a shirt custom made, consumers should ensure they are having it done by people who are aware of the care and quality required for a good-looking shirt. "A common reason why many custom shirt makers do not do well, is that they are staffed by people experienced only in mass production. They may not realize the importance of stitching, or proper monogramming and logos. Little things like that make a shirt."

Soft and simple

SEHM sums up what's happening in men's wear this summer

Simple and soft are the two watchwords for summer 1994 men's fashion.

A fashion which softens the shoulder line, favors comfort and gives full power to flowing, light fabrics in basic colors.

This season's big hit: the waistcoat in knitted, plain or printed fabric to be worn with jackets so unstructured that they can sometimes look like long shirts.

The neutral colors, blues and sun-drenched spicy tones take the lead. Make way for linen in all its forms, cotton and more technical fabrics.

Silhouettes

Spotlight on three-button jackets. With suits, jackets button up higher than usual. On their own, jackets are completely unstructured and take inspiration from workwear or are worn as long shirts. Trousers are more tapered or '50s drainpipe style.

The sportswear world welcomes back the blouson which barely covers the waist. Still very much in favor is the yachting style with reefer jackets and parkas with metallic clips similar to those found on firemen's jackets which have become classics for all seasons.

Among the latest hits, city shirts with small soft collars or long and loose shirts. A strong comeback of the short-sleeved shirt. Knit polo shirts with details in fancy fabric, long T-shirts with loud designs, rugby-style stripes or fine vertical stripes are big.

Fabrics

Some coolwool in false plains at the start of the season. Lots of linen in its pure state or mixed, crumpled and worn. Smooth or embossed seersucker-style cotton with madras, gingham or window checks. Still a lot of viscose mixed with noble fabrics to give softness, as well as strong fabrics like tarpaulin, canvas and twill, often waxed to offer protection against sea spray or showers and denim in all its forms.

Four Main Themes

A Story Of Balance

Simple, fluid and relaxed look. Layering unstructured jackets, long shirts and waistcoats. Distressed, crumpled, ultra-light or heavy fabrics in plain, checked or fine pyjama stripes. A few tropical notes like Nehru collars, trousers with a drawstring waist, Indian trousers draped up to the ankle. The whole range of neutrals colors to contrast with black.

A Story Of Spices

Mixing the city and sporty look in a color range inspired by spices — pepper greens and reds, paprika, saffron and curry for suits and unstructured jackets and blousons. Very little total look but a desire to go for monochromes.

A Story Of Blues

A rustic look for an authentic fashion in a very wide range of blues. Workwear inspired shapes. Checks of all sizes and rustic-style fabrics: dishcloth fabric, twill, suedette and mostly stone-washed jeans. Still lots of knitted or leather waistcoats in plain or striped ticking fabrics. Shirts with rolled-up or short sleeves.

A Story Of Mixes

A graffiti-style fashion which combines explosive mixtures of both colors and prints. Juniors want sleeveless denim waistcoats worn over a loose T-shirt with gigantic prints, baggy overalls, tight or slightly flared jeans, boxer or cycling shorts.

Relance offers casual, practical, garments

By RACHEL ALKALLAY
Special to The CJN

The influence of Africa, a return to nature and the mystery of the Orient sums up the groupings available this spring from Relance.

The innovative Quebec company, with its origins in the Beauce region of the province 40 years ago, has grown into a company with associates showing their wares at home parties throughout Canada.

The emphasis is on customer service and hands-on work with the client. Twenty managers work closely with 200 Relance associates of the family-owned and operated company. Ideas are brought from Europe and recreated here in their entirety in the factory of 200-300 workers at Saint-Georges.

The Relance concept utilizes hostesses who give fashion shows in their homes, organized and coordinated by the Relance associate, who helps choose the outfits modelled by three of the guests.

Participation and fun are key words in the Relance philosophy. The work of Relance's Quebec designers is blended with the European fashions derived from the Pret-a-Porter and Premier Vie collections in Paris, and tailored to the needs and taste of the Canadian woman.

The company creates two collections yearly, with 45 to 50 styles in each. The collections offer casual, practical and highly wearable clothing for day and evening. Mix and match is essential in the Relance collection, which is tailored to the working woman with a family and an active social life.

Long, lean silhouettes characterize the Meditation line. Tunic-style dressing with narrow pants for more casual wear; ultra-long wrap-around skirts inspired by the sarong for the office. The essence of femininity in crinkly crepe, raw cotton/linen blends and shaded-off tapestries. Ecru is warmed by shades of red, orange and rose in prints influenced by the designs of the East.
